"No figure in the history of Florence," says Mr. Horsburgh of Lorenzo, "has quite his fascinations. His virtues trod hard upon the heels of his vices, and his vices, however great, were seldom contemptible." In Lorenzo "Nature displayed herself in all her mixed elements of glory and decay." In easy writing and with wide knowledge of his subject, this, the latest of his biographers, attempts again the record and interpretation of the most typical child of the Renaissance. The historical study is excellent, the complications of the warring Italian principalities in the Pazzi conspiracy and its aftermath, are clearly unravelled

* "Lorenzo the Magnificent, and Florence in Her Golden Age." By E. L. S. Horsburgh. Methuen. 15s. net.

"The Medici Popes." By Herbert M. Vaughan. Methuen. 15s. net.

in a smooth and intelligible narrative. Special chapters on Lorenzo as a poet form a definite and separate piece of valuable literary criticism. Mr. Horsburgh is perhaps less adequate in the general impression of Lorenzo's Florence, which is provided by his record of the golden age. The charm and glamor of that amazing time should have filled the story with a sense of youth, of limitless aspiration, of not inglorious achievement, which have made this age one of the wonder ages of the world. The admirable reproductions here given from Botticelli and Ghirlandajo and the Gozzolis of the Riccardi Chapel, reveal a mystery and enchantment not easily analysable: a kind of gold in the air. That mystery and enchantment is suggested by many of the original authorities: the expression of a spirit of transfiguration which they could not entirely understand. The drama was performed in a limited arena, amongst less than one hundred thousand persons, and in a short space of time. The comparison has been frequently made, and always with justification, with Athens; similar in the limits of its surroundings and their beauty, in the hurry of the progress from obscurity, through a supreme gladness of individual endeavor, into premature decay. The age of Lorenzo is the age of Pericles. Behind is the gloomy medieval town with its tall towers and factional warfare in the narrow dark streets. Beyond is the chaos of the Puritan revival, the French invasion, the final overthrow. In this short breathing space the air is bright and clear, the charm that of the Italian landscape, Fiesole in springtime: some magic mingling with the seed of men, which could suddenly transfigure with unforgettable genius, one valley of Tuscany.

It is a city of merchants—like Athens and all great art centres—eager in trade and commercial expansion, and for that reason not very popular with other communities too proud or stupid to succeed in business affairs. The common illusion, so sedulously fostered by ignorant persons, that aristocracies and landed interests have been patrons of art, defending the artistic existence against the bludgeons of trade and commerce, has been again and again exploded and again and again revived. Aristocracies can compete for the purchase of masters acknowledged as "great" centuries after they have perished in poverty. It has always been the middle class—the trading class—in Greece and Italy, Florence or London, who have supported art in its inception. To such patronage a Botticelli equally with a Burne Jones owes his opportunity of self realisation. Lorenzo, a merchant and prudent financier, the heir of a family of merchants, owes his supremacy in Florence to the fact that he is the typical citizen of a merchant city. He was a statesman, a humanist, a patron of art and letters, something of a mystic, a lover and a poet. But he was also the head of a banking community whose policy was deliberately to encourage cosmopolitan trade. Giovanni had first become popular by his new plan of taxation, "by which everyone was called to contribute to the revenue at a fixed rate per cent": by an Income-tax which "stamped him in the opinion of the masses as their friend." Lorenzo, in the interests of commerce and of the poor, devised a system of taxation to which England is only tardily being driven, and that less by reason than by the force of circumstances. "His fundamental principle," says Mr. Horsburgh, "was that taxation should be graduated, and fall mainly on the land. By this means he could relieve trade and commerce of burdens which hampered their expansion, while making the State mainly dependent on revenues which could be easily assessed and collected. He caused a valuation of all lands in Florentine territory to be made, and assigned ten per cent. of the total value to the State Exchequer. This amount was raised by a graduated land tax rising from seven to twenty-two per cent., according to the value of the amount held." Such a "confiscatory" land tax with a graduated Income-tax superimposed, and later a graduated tax on luxuries, served to maintain prosperity in an age of the richest development of individual life that Christendom has ever known.

"It was the oil of commerce," says this writer, "which kept the lamp of culture burning." There was no department of life in which art did not have its recognised place. The inspiration to great work was only indirectly from the encouragement of patrons: it came from the civic enthusiasm of a whole population which looked on, approving or condemning. The municipal patriotism found expression in beautifying the city by public buildings and princely private houses. Pre-eminent in art, they were pre-eminent also in philosophy and scholarship; pleasure-loving but, on the whole, serious—not frivolous; with, underneath all their curiosity in a newly-discovered world and all their determination to know and to enjoy, "a deep sense of the mystery of life." A perception of the sadness, as well as of the exultation that accompanies beauty, the questionings and shadowings which set the rejoicing always in half lights, sharply distinguished the Florentine from the Athenean renaissance. On the whole, a religious people, though with an exiguous standard of morality, they found in their achievement of beauty, in the life of lovers, in the feverish pursuit of the new knowledge, in the freshly apprehended fascination of the world, always a sense of some undertone of seriousness and of surprise: the sadness and wonder of the Botticelli Venus and Madonna, the magical twilight of the "Prima Vera." That is why Plato came to count for them more than any of the ancients, why so many of the great men of the city are found in their declining days withdrawing themselves from artistic effort or the world of affairs to meditate upon the purpose and destiny of human existence. "We," writes Cosimo to Pius II., after the death of his son, "as you so wisely and religiously wrote, we know nothing. Yet as to my son Giovanni, I have never thought anything ill done, since he has passed, not from life, but from death to life. For this that we call life is really death. That is true life which is eternal."

"This that we call life is really death." It was the inner confession—at moments—of all this company which ruled and revelled and enjoyed, seizing so many of life's good things, at a time when life had so many good things to give. Lorenzo filled his existence with such a wealth of experiences in so many diverse fields as to make future observers wonder how it were possible to overcome even the limitations of the hours—how twenty-four hours sufficed for each crowded day. And in such a varied, rich career, as in the Medicean political method, he stood as representative of his age and city. Mr. Horsburgh notes "the perfect harmony which in all things existed between the Medici and the aims, ideas, and aspirations of the Florentine people. The evil and the good in them corresponded to the mixed elements of the Florentine people." "Il Magnifico" is for once an historical designation entirely justified. It is an air of "magnificence" that pervades the picture. Issues sometimes unscrupulous or corrupt are set in a large horizon. A certain opulence and carelessness in generosity and patronage and accumulation is there, which is open to criticism, but is never simply petty and mean. Whether Lorenzo is offering himself to his enemy at Naples, desiring, as he writes, "that my life, my death, my prosperity, my misfortunes, may contribute to the welfare of the city"; or accumulating art treasures, freely to bestow them on others, Greek manuscripts, not to hoard them in some private collection, but to scatter them amongst the libraries of Italy; or endowing learning in an Academy, or building churches or palaces, or pursuing his private business as a lover, he is always surrounded by a spacious and generous atmosphere—a vision above the narrow limits of a narrow personal aggrandisement. And this attribute was shared by a city which could boast even in the days of her decline that her wealth and talent had always been bestowed upon the whole world: that Humanity, and not merely local or Imperial power had gained from the genius of Florence.

The last years of his rule marked the culminating point in her prosperity. "Her successful pursuit of material well-being afforded the means and the leisure which the cultivation of the inward life of art and beauty and refinement requires. Trained through long centuries in the traditions of culture, Florence, under Lorenzo, saw the realisation of her ideals. To her as a centre, all that was best in the world of the spirit seemed naturally to gravitate, and from her the heat of her own enthusiasms radiated throughout Italy." Small wonder that, remembering the end which was shortly to come to pass, men afterwards looked back longingly to his age as a golden age, and to his care as that of "the father of his people," that signs and portents accompanied his departure, fierce lights blazing in the sky, and ghosts appearing in Marsilio Ficino's garden with terrible and confused voices, that lightning struck the lantern of the Duomo, and twin lights flamed over Arezzo, and "a star of unusual brightness illuminated the heavens while Lorenzo lay dying, being extinguished at the moment of his death." The portents were to celebrate less the overthrow of a tyrant than the vanishing of an age.

For the inevitable law of human things, in Athens and in Florence, had completed the cycle with feverish rapidity. Simplicity and devotion had brought wealth and prosperity; wealth and prosperity bred arrogance and corruption. The greatness, the rise and the fall is all compressed within the limits of a century. At the end of Lorenzo's rule, "the very prosperity," says Mr. Horsburgh, "was a symptom of a diseased State. The pursuit of wealth, ease, and luxury became the main purpose of life to all classes of the population." The rise in the standard of comfort was coincident with the growth of indifference to every aspect of government other than its economic aspect. "The hunger for riches," wrote Guicciardini, "makes them follow their own private interests without any regard or consideration for the public honor and glory." Mr. Herbert Vaughan, in his study of the Medici Popes, has traced the story of the decline. If Lorenzo is the typical figure of the early springtime of the Italian Renaissance, Leo X. and Clement VII. are equally typical—the one of the parched heat of the later summer, the other of the early autumn of decay. Lorenzo's second son can make Rome the artistic and intellectual centre of the Christian world; but it is a dry, sapless splendor, glittering and sterile, with none of the mystery and boundless promise which accompanied the early days. On the death of his brother, Leo was admonished to control his feelings and show no natural emotion "since the supreme Pontiff is not a man, but a demi-god, and ought therefore always to exhibit a serene and smiling countenance." This is the spirit of a Court whose brilliance, flattery, and extravagance revealed a humanity once more proclaiming themselves as gods, and set upon building a tower to scale the walls of heaven. The end comes soon in the utter destruction and the sack of Rome under Leo X.'s cousin. The whole fabric falls into collapse, while Italy is rent in wars and tumults, and the Renaissance passes into the horrors of divided Christendom fiercely fighting between Protestant and Catholic. Rome is rejoicing at the death of the despised and discredited Medicean pope. No portents in the sky foretell the passing of a hero. "It was even planned by some indignant Romans to drag the corpse itself from its coffin and draw it ignominiously with a hook through the streets of the city." Venit summa dies et ineluctabile fatum: an end not only to each famous man, but to every age in which for a season it has seemed that human life itself, in a time of order and enjoyment, can overthrow the boundaries within which it is normally confined.

SOCIAL SETTLEMENTS AND THEIR INVENTORS.*

When everything else about Canon and Mrs. Barnett is forgotten—which will not be in our time—they will be remembered as the inventors of social settlements. The echoes of many controversies ring through these pages—the gradual clearing of the issues regarding the unemployed before and since the Act of 1905; the perennial war waged by Mrs. Barnett against barrack schools; the rival or complementary schemes and methods for educating the people and bringing home to their real lives the fruits and flowers of culture; above all, the balanced claims of the desire to better people's surroundings and to spare them harsh treatment, and the desire, no less justified, to stimulate, instead of sapping, their independence and energy and initiative, their capacity for self-help and self-redemption. But the tone is seldom controversial. It is tolerant, public-spirited, concrete, critical, non-partisan; it confronts theories with observed facts; it shrinks from linking its generalisations closely together; there is a recurrent distrust of work on the large scale, of institutions, of reform through machinery. Its defect, perhaps, lies just here, in that its arrows are often too bluntly tipped, if they have tips at all; they rebound without seriously dinting the brazen shields of monopoly and giant wrong; nay, not seldom they fall at the very feet of the Philistines, convenient for them to shoot back at us.

This tolerance, this broad-mindedness, this non-committal attitude and eagerness to get the best out of all parties and classes, pervade nearly all the varied and suggestive papers which Canon and Mrs. Barnett have collected into a good-sized volume. But naturally one especially remarks them in the three articles on Toynbee Hall, half autobiography and half theorising, in which the authors tell us what they intended their settlement to be and what they have tried to make it. Canon Barnett opposes the idea of a settlement to that of a mission, much as one might oppose the idea of plastic art to that of didactic. A settlement is not to have a "purpose" outside the natural enrichment of the lives of its members and their friends. Rich can learn from poor, poor from rich, and each be incalculably happier and wiser for knowing the other. No doubt their association will lead to the undertaking of definite enterprises—clubs, lectures, excursions, parties, schemes for education or entertainment or relief. But these are for Canon Barnett the offshoots of a Settlement's life, not its essentials. "Its classes, its social schemes," he writes, "are not so true a test of its success as its effect in establishing friendship between man and man." He has the rooted conviction that what one individual can do for another by personal contact can never be replaced by what he can do through philanthropic machinery; and that the second sort of social effort is almost bound to go wrong unless inspired and guided by the first. Therefore the first, and almost the last, thing which he wants the settlement to do is to establish "neighbourhood" between rich and poor. Having done that, it should, as an institution, stand almost entirely neutral. If he recognises in it any further essential function, it is, perhaps, that whereas English local government assumes the existence of an educated leisured class to run it, a settlement should provide such a class artificially in districts where it does not naturally exist. But while this means that members of Settlements may be active politicians, the Settlement as a body should never commit itself politically.

This idea—the founder's—of what a Settlement should be, is worth recalling because it has been so generally departed from. No doubt there is a truth in Canon Barnett's view, that some so-called Settlements are merely missions misdescribed; but the fact remains that the bulk of the undeniable Settlements have come to regard their machinery, their "activities," as essentials, and have come also to abandon in one direction after another the pretence of neutrality. Nor is it easy to condemn them. Experience, we think, hardly bears out the opposition which Canon Barnett emphasises between the cult of neighbourliness and that of machinery, and supports still less his view that the former flourishes best in an atmosphere of neutrality. Neutrality is often the best course, but it is unnatural and chilling. The pretty high standard of it maintained at Toynbee Hall under Canon Barnett's reign has established no special warmth or depth of relations between the two classes there; on the contrary, most people with a wide knowledge of different Settlements would, we think, rank Toynbee Hall decidedly low in this respect. The Settlements which in recent years have committed themselves most audaciously in, for instance, local politics, are precisely those in which the personal gap between members of different classes had been most fully bridged.

As to the relative value of residence and machinery in a Settlement, many people again (especially those familiar with Settlements in provincial towns) would almost reverse Canon Barnett's estimate. Living in a Settlement has many drawbacks. There is always a certain ring-fence round "the residents," whom the real residents in the locality can scarcely help classing as a race apart. Living directly among the people brings you much nearer them. But for units so placed singly, what the Settlement can supply, and what they can least supply for themselves, is, precisely, machinery. Yet further, there is now some criticism of "settlement for settlement's sake," and a degree of conscious reaction against Canon Barnett's tendency to deprecate the test of external results. It is said with truth, that however much you gloss it over, settling nearly always means some self-sacrifice on the settler's part, and he nearly always does it with some consciousness of virtue. If to this self-sacrifice and this consciousness of virtue no actual objective betterment of the poor corresponds, you may get—and unquestionably you often do get—a very dangerous result. The rich man measures what he has done by what he feels—i.e., by the really heavy drafts which he has made on his own stock of goodness; but as a measure of any real good which he has done to others, this may be disastrously misleading.

* "Towards Social Reform." By Canon and Mrs. S. A. Barnett. Fisher Unwin. 5s.

Yet when all is said, the debt which the vexed modern world owes to the Settlements is a very considerable one, nor has all of it been incurred yet; and the debt which they owe to the blend of sanity and audacity, broad tolerance and deep earnestness, which characterised their inventors, is more considerable still. How easily the idea could have made shipwreck under other auspices, the repeated failures of to-day sufficiently show. Of the intellectual breadth and strength of the Barnetts this volume will afford testimony hereafter; one hopes it may convey, also, some measure of their personal spell.

FOR SPECIALISTS.*

One may be tempted to wonder why Italian art continues to attract so many investigators, in view of the enormous literature, compared with that of other countries' art, that has grown up around the Italian schools. But the very vastness of this literature would appear an inducement to produce more, and would seem not merely to have no deterrent effect on the specialist, but actually to propel him to greater depths of specialisation. Consequently the learned tomes about the really great masters of Italy have been succeeded by equally ponderous ones about the little masters, the latter being in no way inferior to the former in point of erudition; one little maker of altar-pieces after another has been dragged from obscurity into the light, until there hardly remains an Italian who handled brushes, who has not become the special subject of a modern specialist, and until, notwithstanding the admitted importance of Italian art, some rude Philistine people say it has been overdone.

These remarks on Italian art and its investigators were suggested by the reading of the laboriously long, splendidly illustrated, infinitely erudite volume, compiled by Constance Jocelyn Ffoulkes and Dr. Rodolpho Maiocchi, on "Vincenzo Foppa, of Brescia, founder of the Lombard school . . . with ninety illustrations . . . and ninety-seven documents." The conclusion of the sub-title hints at what one must expect, and no reader should sit down to this work in a light or frivolous mood. Long before we come to the documents, which are relegated to an appendix, we realise that this is a book to be read slowly and seriously, or not at all. There is, for instance, a footnote on practically every page, varying in size from a few lines to five inches of solid type. Then, apart from this bewildering expedient, the text itself is so anxious to inform and suggest upon everything connected with Foppa, on Foppa's works, Foppa's movements, Foppa's circumstances, Foppa's associates, Foppa's town residence, &c., that all the details seem to be, and probably are, of exactly equal importance; so that it is only fair to the book to try and assimilate all or none. When, finally, we come to the documents, having by that time forgotten most of what we read in the early portion of the book, we are reminded of, and given chapter and verse for, nearly everything we were supposed to have remembered. So far as we can guess, no document bearing on Foppa's strangely unadventurous career has been omitted. We even find—on page 342—documents such as "Evangelista Foppa receives the rent from his father's tenant," and "Francesco Foppa pays his father's dues to the hospital." There are, of course, more valuable documents than these concerning the filial performances of the young Foppas, yet it is unfortunate—even pathetic—that not one of the ninety-seven throws any light whatsoever on that part of Foppa's life which has puzzled all previous historians, namely, the first part. We are no nearer than before to knowing what Foppa did with his youth, and whence he got his artistic training. It becomes, however, tolerably certain that he owed the bulk of his schooling to Verona, and not to Padua, as has sometimes been stated; also that he lived for many years longer than he is commonly supposed to have done, although, as his last days are as obscure as his first, this addition to our knowledge is not so great as it might appear.

It will be gathered from the above that this tremendous volume is essentially by Foppaists for Foppaists, and the humble outsider's criticism must necessarily be of a general character. With this limitation in mind, we are constrained to say that the book makes little attempt to reconstruct Foppa's personality for us: it is content to give facts and leave the reader to do the rest. And as these facts are mainly too trivial to be inspiring, the image of the man remains as nebulous as it was before the day of four-guinea biographies. We are on safer ground with the pictures, authentic and unauthentic, in the classification of which the authors have shown a care and patience beyond praise. But on the question of Foppa's place in the art world we find ourselves at variance with the claim, put forward in the title, that he "founded" the Lombard school. Morelli's assertion that Foppa held in the schools of Brescia and Milan a position similiar to that occupied at Padua and Mantua by Mantegna, is not sufficient to warrant the claim of founder, even if Morelli was always right. To ourselves Foppa has always appeared as an industrious minor master, working within a very limited range—he confined himself to religious themes—whose art might have given ideas to many other painters without profoundly influencing any; while as a "founder" of the Lombard school, he is tacitly disposed of by the authors themselves in the admission that the school had a position in North Italy before his day. We are told, furthermore, that his influence at Brescia was "neither deep-rooted nor enduring," and nobody needs to be reminded that Leonardo, when he came to Milan, swept all other influences off the field. These reflections tend to lessen one's interest in Foppa from the public standpoint. We doubt not, however, that there are Foppa enthusiasts, and these will find the book—and, as we have said, it is not a book for the general public—as trustworthy a digest of archivist research as could have been produced.

* "Vincenzo Foppa, of Brescia, Founder of the Lombard School: His Life and Work." By Constance Jocelyn Ffoulkes and Monsignor Rodolpho Maiocchi, D.D. John Lane. £4 4s. net.

FRATERNITY.*

The world of our sub-conscious thought, which has claimed the belated attention of modern science, is shadowed forth in the portraiture of certain artists, such as Rembrandt. Communities and social classes, no less than individuals, live by virtue of instinctive feelings which they are careful not to scrutinise, and it is Mr. Galsworthy's distinction to analyse in his clever, subtle pictures of English society, aspects of class relationships of which our other novelists seem unconscious. Mr. and Mrs. Barthwick, for example, in "The Silver Box," who prided themselves on their successful life of middle-class rectitude, were suddenly precipitated, by chilling contact with a wastrel and a girl of bad reputation into facing immoral aspects of their own and their son's conduct, which otherwise would have remained screened in the semi-conscious twilight of their minds. It is because the educated Englishman has brought to the finest perfection this instinctive art of boycotting mentally all the distressing facts that swarm around him, that both his soul and his social conduct offer such diverting material for the insidious analysis of Mr. Galsworthy.

"Fraternity" in some respects is the most interesting, perhaps the most instructive, novel the author has given us. Less impeccable in structure than "The Country House," it is more human than "The Man of Property," and it is evident throughout the shifting scenes that the author is sympathising with all the characters, even while he is ironically philosophising on the strength of the class barriers that keep the rich man and the poor apart. "Fraternity" owes its significance and artistic force to the fact that its two sets of characters—the one rich, the other poor—brought together on the same stage, are by turns the social criticism of each other. And the strength of the social satire lies in the inevitability of this scheme of

* "Fraternity." By John Galsworthy. Heinemann. 6s.

Werner Laurie's New Books

THE COMING SCIENCE.

By HEREWARD CARRINGTON. Author of "The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism." With an introduction by JAMES H. HYSLOP, Ph.D., LL.D. Crown 8vo, Cloth, 7/6 net.

This book fills a place in the literature of psychical research not covered by any other book that has thus far appeared. Its aim is threefold: (1) To form an introduction to the study of the subject, so that any one may feel familiar with the general problems and results without having previously read extensively upon it; (2) to approach the baffling questions from the standpoint of physical science, and point out exactly what the difficulties and objections are, to the scientific man; (3) to summarise the various explanatory theories that have been advanced from time to time to explain the facts of psychical research.

GENERAL LEE: MAN AND SOLDIER.

By THOMAS NELSON PAGE. With a Photogravure Portrait. Crown 8vo, 6/- net.

Mr. Page portrays Lee's character as the fruit of modern, as Washington's was of Colonial Virginia civilisation, devotion to duty being its keynote from first to last. The book is based on public records and on the trustworthy testimony of personal witnesses.

TRAGEDIES OF THE MEDICI: A Muster Roll of Intrigue and Crime.

By EDGCUMBE STALEY. Author of "The Guilds of Florence" With 52 illustrations and hand coloured photogravure frontispiece. Cloth gilt, Demy 8vo, 12/6 net.

NIGHTS WITH THE GODS.

A study of present-day social, religious, literary, and political features, clothed in the form of humorous criticism. By EMIL REICH (Doctor Juris). Price 6/-

STRANGE STORIES FROM A CHINESE STUDIO.

Translated from the Original by PROFESSOR GILES of Cambridge. 6/- net.

If you would like to know the manners, customs, superstitions, trades, and social life of the Chinese at first hand you should read this amusing and interesting volume.

ROADS TO RICHES: The Romance of Money-Making.

By THORNTON HALL. 3/6 net.

Dramatic and true stories of huge fortunes piled up from unpromising beginnings.

"A remarkably strong novel, the interest of which begins with the first line and continues unbroken to the last—a thoroughly powerful and stimulating story."—Daily Telegraph.

THE SILENT ONES.

By MARY GAUNT and J. RIDGWELL ESSEX. Authors of "Fools Rush In." 6/-

EIGHT NEW NOVELS.

1. The Dukedom of Portsea. ALICE MAUD MEADOWS.
2. Lil of the Slums. DICK DONOVAN.
3. The Isle of Lies. M. P. SHIEL.
4. Love and a Woman. By CHARLOTTE MANSFIELD, author of "The Girl and the Gods."
5. The Adventures of Louis Blake. LOUIS BECKE.
6. A Gentleman from Portland. RANGER GULL.
7. The Silent Ones. MARY GAUNT and J. RIDGWELL ESSEX.
8. Red Love. GERTIE DE S. WENTWORTH-JAMES.

T. WERNER LAURIE, CLIFFORD'S INN, LONDON.

MR. JOHN LANE has pleasure in announcing that he has just issued the first number of The Bodleian;

A Journal of Books at The Bodley Head

One Penny monthly. Specimen Copy sent on application.

MR. JOHN LANE'S LIST

THE JOURNAL OF JOHN MAYNE

During a Tour on the Continent upon its Re-opening after the Fall of Napolean, 1814.

Edited by his Grandson, JOHN MAYNE COLLES. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net

"Very readable and obviously trustworthy and sincere."—Morning Post.

BRITISH MALAYA

An Account of the Origin and Progress of British Influence in Malaya. By Sir F. A. SWETTENHAM. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo. NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. 7s. 6d. net

ON THE TRACKS OF LIFE

The Immorality of Morality. Translated from the Italian of LEO G. SERA, by J. M. KENNEDY, with an Introduction by Dr. OSCAR LEVY. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net

Dr. Sera is a physician who has deeply studied literature and historical science, and the object of his book is, in the opening words of the preface, "to establish our conception of social life on its original basis." He holds that the diffusion of democratic principles is vulgarising science and art, and that present social conditions, especially work and Christian teaching, are leading to the intellectual and moral degeneration of the race.

UNDER PETRAIA, WITH SOME SAUNTERINGS

By the Author of "In a Tuscan Garden." With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 5s. net

"Purely conversational in style as this book is, it possesses that indefinable literary charm which holds fast the reader who has once opened its pages, so that he cannot put it down till he has reached the end. Even then it will be taken up again and again, to be dipped into here and there as the fancy seizes us."—Globe.

"We can imagine no pleasanter preparation for a leisurely holiday in Northern Italy than the perusal of this volume."—Academy.

A SISTER OF PRINCE RUPERT: Elizabeth Princess Palatine, Abbess of Herford.

By ELIZABETH GODFREY, Author of "Heidelberg: Its Princes and its Palaces," "English Children in the Olden Time," &c. With numerous Illustrations Reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints, &c. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net

"No historical biography published during the last few years surpasses this one in the minuteness of its research and the width of the field it has covered."—Morning Post.

MADRID An Historical and Descriptive Account of the Spanish Capital.

With 450 Illustrations. By A. F. CALVERT. (The Spanish Series.) 3s. 6d. net

LADIES FAIR AND FRAIL Sketches of the Demi-Monde during the Eighteenth Century.

By HORACE BLEACKLEY, Author of "The Story of a Beautiful Duchess." With numerous Portraits reproduced from contemporary sources. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net

NEW NOVELS

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH

By ALICE HERBERT.

"It constitutes a piece of psychology of which the author may well be proud; absorbing in interest; lightened, too, by abundant humour, and dialogue that is brilliant, but not unnaturally so."—Academy.

THE DOOMSWOMAN

By GERTRUDE ATHERTON. A NEW EDITION.

"A fine drama, finely conceived and finely executed."—Morning Post.

PRINCE'S PRANKS

By CHARLES LOWE.

LITTLE DINNERS with the SPHINX

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

"Ten little stories of the rarest, most delicate charm. Fantastic, of course; sentimental, sometimes tragic, with a kindly elf of humour smiling behind it all."—Observer.

BALTHASAR

By ANATOLE FRANCE.

"Delightful expressions of vision, thought, and knowledge, seemingly so slight, yet so compact, and told with an almost scientific precision. . . . . Mrs. John Lane has done the translation with insight and affection."—Daily Chronicle.

SOMEONE PAYS

By NOEL BARWELL.

Pereunt et imputantur. . . . . The oysters are eaten, and put down in the bill: but you observe, Lady Mickleham, it doesn't say whose bill.—(DOLLY DIALOGUES.)

SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

JOHN LANE: THE BODLEY HEAD, W.

things, which keeps one set of people "submerged," and the other too prosperous, refined, healthy-minded, and fastidious to think about, far less to come into human contact with their "shadows" who people the mean streets and slums stretching near their doors. It is only by a social accident, followed by a thin chain of favouring circumstances, that it comes about that the "submerged" characters come into the foreground of "Fraternity."

The two highly typical Kensington households of cultivated, fastidious, upper-middle class people, between which the main action of the story is developed, are those of Hilary and Stephen Dallison, brothers, "of an old Oxfordshire family which, for three hundred years at least, had served the Church and State." The brothers, now in middle age, have married respectively Bianca and Cecilia Stone, "the grand-daughters of Mr. Justice Carfax, of the well-known county family—the Carfaxes, of Spring Deans, Hants," and their aged father, Professor Sylvanus Stone, who lives with Hilary and Bianca, is a retired, once famous lecturer in sociology. Into the well-ordered, decorous, and smooth-gliding life of the Dallisons, which might be symbolised by their perfectly-appointed West End houses, furnished in exactingly discreet taste with the choicest "old things," steals the invading shadow of a Hound Street household of people, their sordid griefs and squalid atmosphere and mean struggle with grinding poverty. The human medium by which the gulf is bridged between these rich and poor, is "the little model," a girl of the people, Devonshire bred, whom Hilary befriends, after she has sat to his wife Bianca for the figure in her picture, "The Shadow."

It would be futile for us to try to indicate the development of this situation, which is elaborated in a succession of delicate strokes page after page, through forty-one chapters. It is in the exactness of the social atmosphere of the relations of these two sets of characters, the Dallisons and the Hound Street household (which latter consists of the little model, a seamstress and her husband, and an ex-butler, a street vendor of newspapers) that the artistic triumph of "Fraternity" is brought about. A single quotation will enlighten our readers, where further explanation would weary them:—

> In her morning-room Mrs. Stephen Dallison sat at an old oak bureau collecting her scattered thoughts. They lay about on pieces of scattered notepaper, beginning "Dear Cecilia," or "Mrs. Tallents Smallpiece requests," or on bits of pasteboard headed by the names of theatres, galleries, or small halls; or, again, on paper of not quite so good a quality, commencing "Dear Friend," and ending with a single well-known name like "Suffolk," so that no suspicion should attach to the appeal contained between the two. She had before her also sheets of her own writing-paper, headed "76, The Old Square, Kensington," and two little books. One of these was bound in marbleized paper, and on it written: "Please keep this book in safety"; across the other, cased in the skin of some small animal deceased, was inscribed the solitary word "Engagements."
>
> Cecilia had on a Persian-green silk blouse with sleeves that would have hidden her slim hands, but for silver buttons made in the likeness of little roses at her wrists; on her brow was a faint frown, as though she was wondering what her thoughts were all about. She sat there every morning catching those thoughts, and placing them in one or other of her little books. Only by thus working hard could she keep herself, her husband, and daughter, in due touch with all the different movements going on. And that the touch might be as due as possible, she had a little headache nearly every day. For the dread of letting slip one movement, or of being too much taken up with another, was very real to her; there were so many people who were interesting, so many sympathies of hers and Stephen's which she desired to cultivate, that it was a matter of the utmost import not to cultivate any single one too much. Then, too, the duty of remaining feminine with all this going forward taxed her constitution. . . . Ringing the bell, she thought, "It will be a job for Mrs. Hughs, poor thing. I believe she'll do it quite as well as Rose and Thorn. Would you please ask Mrs. Hughs to come to me? Oh, is that you, Mrs. Hughs? Come in."
>
> The seamstress, who had advanced into the middle of the room, stood with her worn hands against her sides, and no sign of life but the liquid patience in her large brown eyes. She was an enigmatic figure. Her presence always aroused a sort of irritation in Cecilia, as if she had suddenly been confronted with what might possibly have been herself if certain little accidents had omitted to occur. She was so conscious that she ought to sympathise, so anxious to show that there was no barrier between them, so eager to be all she ought to be, that her voice almost purred.
>
> "Are you getting on with the curtains, Mrs. Hughs?"
>
> "Yes, m'm, thank you, m'm."
>
> "I shall have another job for you to-morrow—altering a dress. Can you come?"
>
> "Yes, m'm, thank you, m'm."
>
> "Is the baby well?"
>
> "Yes, m'm, thank you, m'm."
>
> There was a silence.
>
> "It's no good talking of her domestic matters," thought Cecilia; "not that I don't care!" But the silence getting on her nerves, she said quickly: "Is your husband behaving himself better?"
>
> There was no answer. Cecilia saw a tear trickle slowly down the woman's cheek.
>
> "Oh dear, oh dear," she thought, "poor thing! I'm in for it!"
>
> Mrs. Hughs' whispering voice began: "He's behaving himself dreadful, m'm. I was going to speak to you. It's ever since that young girl"—her face hardened—"came to live down in my room there; he seems to—he seems to—just do nothing but neglect me."
>
> Cecilia's heart gave just the little pleasurable flutter which the heart must feel at the love dreams of other folk, however painful. . . . "I've said to him: 'Whatever are you thinking of? And after Mrs. Hilary's been so kind to me!' But he's like a madman when he's in liquor, and he says he'll go to Mrs. Hilary——"
>
> "Go to my sister? What about? The ruffian!"
>
> At hearing her husband called a ruffian by another woman the shadow of resentment passed across Mrs. Hughs' face, leaving it quivering and red. The conversation had already made a strange difference in the manner of these two women to each other. It was as though each one knew exactly how much sympathy and confidence would be expected of the other, as though life had suddenly sucked up the mist and shown them standing one on either side of a deep trench. In Mrs. Hughs' eyes there was the look of those who have long discovered that they must not answer back for fear of losing what little ground they have to stand on; and Cecilia's eyes were cold and watchful. "I sympathise," they seemed to say, "I sympathise; but you must please understand that you cannot expect sympathy if your affairs compromise the members of my family." Her chief thought now was to be relieved of the company of this woman, who had been betrayed into showing what lay beneath her dumb, stubborn patience.

The above passage is characteristic of the extreme subtlety of Mr. Galsworthy's art at its best, of its living freshness, of its unveiling of shades of class feeling which refined natures strive to hide, and which coarse natures accentuate in their daily contact. We say "the author's art at its best," but, in truth, the author keeps steadily near this level. Cecilia Dallison, Stephen, and her husband, and Thyme, their fresh, sweet little daughter, are the triumph of the book. Hilary Dallison, this mild, fastidious, and over-scrupulous nature, whose sensitive self-consciousness has paralysed his springs of action, is less a type of modern Englishman than the human embodiment of generations of gentle breeding and safe environment, of which the dilettante is the fruit. Bianca, his wife, in her cold hostility and passive bitterness, is wonderfully indicated. The aged Professor Stone, whose flow of ideas in his magnum opus, "The Brotherhood of Man," serves as comic relief to the general picture, is, we think, an excrescence on the artistic scheme. The characters of the "submerged" class—the seamstress and her husband Hughs, and the ex-butler "Westminster"—are most convincing figures seen through middle-class eyes. Hughs, especially, in his brooding rage and violent outbreaks, is a creation of which any novelist might be proud. There remains for consideration the figure of the real heroine of the book, the "little model," whose muteness, weakness, and limpet-like power of clinging on are essentially feminine. As a study of the intricate web of "the social conscience" in our community, "Fraternity" is a new departure in fiction.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"Earthworks of England," by Mr. A. Hadrian Allcroft (Macmillan, 18s. net), is a portly volume of seven hundred pages, intended for the general reader rather than the expert, though we suspect there are not many general readers whose interest in the subject is strong enough to induce them to take up a book so formidable in appearance. Those who do will find Mr. Allcroft a well-informed and entertaining guide. Most of the space is given up to earthworks which the author has personally examined. He gives many pleasant reminiscences of his visits, and his descriptions both of the earthworks themselves and of the

Mr. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

GEORGE CANNING

AND HIS FRIENDS. Containing hitherto Unpublished letters, Jeux d'Esprit, &c. Edited by Captain JOSCELINE BAGOT. With portraits. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 30s net.

". . . carefully and competently edited by Captain Bagot . . . a contribution of first-rate importance to the history of England and Europe."—The Manchester Guardian.

". . . their value may be adjudged when we say that no man will in future be able to discuss authoritatively the period with which they deal unless he has at least glanced through them. Their contents must make them a political classic; and they are well and unobtrusively edited. The editor is exactly what an editor should be."—The Globe.

THE LIFE OF ADMIRAL SIR LEOPOLD McCLINTOCK,

The Great Arctic Explorer and Discoverer of the Fate of Franklin. By Sir CLEMENTS MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVES:

Their Present Condition and Progress. Edited by the SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE RACES COMMITTEE Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

"The volume is well packed with statistics, and rests its arguments upon facts, and facts alone, while at the same time it displays a wide faculty for forecasting future developments, and a refreshingly calm and judicial demeanour in the face of boding difficulties."
—Daily Telegraph.

HYDROGRAPHICAL SURVEYING.

Description of the Means and Methods Employed in Constructing Marine Charts. By the late Rear-Admiral Sir W. J. L. WHARTON, K.C.B. A New Edition, Revised and Enlarged by Rear-Admiral MOSTYN FIELD, F.R.S., Hydrographer to the Admiralty. With Diagrams and Illustrations, medium 8vo, 21s. net.

W. J. LOCKE'S NEW NOVEL.

SEPTIMUS.

By the Author of "The Beloved Vagabond." Fourth Impression. 6s.

Truth says: "If you want a perfectly delightful book, get W. J. Locke's 'Septimus.'"

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

THE POOR LAW COMMISSION

THE MINORITY REPORT.

THE BREAK-UP of the POOR LAW being

Part I. of the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission.

Edited, with Introduction, by SIDNEY and BEATRICE WEBB
8vo, pp. xx and 604, 7s. 6d. net. (Inland postage 6d.)

The Volume concludes with a Scheme of Reform, of novel and far-reaching character, which is elaborately worked out in detail, involving the abolition of the workhouse and the complete disappearance of the Poor Law.

THE PUBLIC ORGANIZATION OF THE LABOUR MARKET being

Part II. of the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission.

Edited, with Introduction, by SIDNEY and BEATRICE WEBB
8vo, pp. xvi and 348, 5s. net. (Inland postage 4d.)

The final chapter on Proposals for Reform gives, in elaborate detail, the Minority's plan for solving the whole problem of Unemployment.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO, 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER,"

will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

ENGLISH REVIEW

MARCH NUMBER NOW ON SALE.

No. IV. CONTENTS. PRICE 2s. 6d.

EMILE VERHAEREN. La Prière.
ETHEL CLIFFORD. The Dryad.
The Back of Beyond.
HENRY JAMES. "The Velvet Glove."
JOSEPH CONRAD. Some Reminiscences (iv).
VIOLET HUNT. The Coach.
H. GRANVILLE BARKER. Georgiana (ii).
M. Family Stories of a Civil Servant.
H. G. WELLS. Tono-Bungay.

A Special Article on the

RUSSIAN SPY SYSTEM

And a Censored Article by HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P., on the

SOURCE OF INFORMATION

THE MONTH, &c.

CONTENTS OF JANUARY AND FEBRUARY NUMBERS.

No. II. JANUARY, 1909. Vol. I.

1. D. G. ROSSETTI. Jan Van Hunks.
2. ANATOLE FRANCE. Les Etrennes de Mlle. de Doucine.
3. JOSEPH CONRAD. Some Reminiscences. II.
4. VERNON LEE. The Virgin of the Seven Daggers. I.
5. TOLSTOI. The Raid. (Conclusion)
6. H. G. WELLS. Tono-Bungay. II.
7. THE MONTH.

Editorial: The Functions of the Arts in the Republic. II.—Drama. THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON: Notes on "Jan Van Hunks"; GEORGE MEREDITH: Notes on "Cheyne Walk."

No. III. FEBRUARY, 1909.

1. MODERN POETRY. Gerhart Hauptmann, W. B. Yeats, Walter de la Mare, J. Marjoram, John Galsworthy.
2. NORMAN DOUGLAS. The Island of Typhoeus.
3. H. GRANVILLE BARKER. Georgiana. I.
4. JOSEPH CONRAD. Some Reminiscences. III.
5. SATURIN IVAN "ISVOSCHICK."
6. VERNON LEE. The Virgin of the Seven Daggers. (Conclusion)
7. H. G. WELLS. Tono-Bungay.
8. THE MONTH.

Editorial: The Functions of the Arts in the Republic. III.—Music.
Political and Diplomatic: The Empire—(i) A. M., India; (ii) Seyed Sirdar Ali Khan, The Present Discontent in India; (iii) G. Egremont Australia.
Communications: From Messina, by O. Rossetti Agresti. Balance-sheet of a Twenty-five acre Holding by F. E. Green.
Reviews: Orthodoxy, by G. K. Chesterton, reviewed by R. A. Scott James.

DUCKWORTH & CO., Henrietta Street, W.C.

scenery about them have charm and distinction. Following the classification drawn up by the Committee on Ancient Earthworks and Fortified Enclosures, Mr. Allcroft divides defensive earthworks into three classes—Promontory Forts, Contour Forts, and Plateau Forts. The first class occupy the ends of headlands or cliffs, and their strength chiefly depends on their position. The theory generally held regarding them is that they were the last strongholds of a beaten race, though it is possible that they may have been the work of invaders landing from the sea. The Contour Forts belong to a more settled state of civilisation, and their main purpose seems to have been to provide a defence against wolves and other wild beasts, though doubtless also they were sometimes used for protection against hostile tribes. Plateau Forts stand on ground presenting no special defensive advantages, but many earthworks which might hastily be placed in this class, were once protected by peat bogs, or even by deep water. After discussing these defensive earthworks, Mr. Allcroft proceeds to deal with the sites of primitive homesteads, villages, circular huts, and other similar establishments, an interesting chapter being given to the ancient dewponds which possibly provided them with water. Next follow accounts of Roman camps, Saxon and Danish earthworks, Norman castles, and miscellaneous ruins, and the book ends with a description of the remarkable series of earthworks that lie on the slope of the South Downs and of Dolebury Camp in Somerset. Mr. Allcroft makes no claim to have added much to what is already known about his subject. He modestly says in his preface that there is probably nothing in his book which has not been said before. But in making accessible to the general reader a great deal of matter which, up to the present, has been buried in learned treatises or transactions of societies, he has certainly done good service, and though at best the subject is rather arid and technical, Mr. Allcroft has gone a long way towards giving it a popular interest. The book is well provided with plans and illustrations.

* * *

Of all bad books the least endurable is the type which attempts wit and achieves dullness. We gather that Dr. Emil Reich's latest volume, "Nights with the Gods" (Werner Laurie, 6s.), is intended to amuse. If this be so, the author has not succeeded. The book is quite ineffective. Its travesty of contemporary English society is so exaggerated that every shaft of satire intended—if Dr. Reich chooses to be judged as a satirist—goes wide of the mark. But if the execution of the book is lamentable, its plan is excellent. The gods and heroes, chiefly Greeks, meet at night to discuss English contemporary life, and Dr. Reich reports their conversations. Properly handled this exchange of views might have given us a pointed satire on present-day thought, philosophy, religion, politics, drama, scholarship, and—a subject on which Dr. Reich is supposed to speak with some authority—women. But, as we have indicated, the author fails so completely to understand English life and ideas, and draws so absurd a picture, that his satire is pointless; while, whether it be Aristotle, Diogenes, Alcibiades, Plato, or Cæsar who is speaking, no attempt is made to reproduce the appropriate tone or method of treatment. The delineation of English "shockingitis," English specialism, English politics, and English religion seems to afford endless mirth to the assembled gods—and to Dr. Reich. We can only say that their frequent laughter will not be shared, except by such persons as regard bad puns and poor personalities as substitutes for wit.

* * *

In his volume called "In the Days of the Councils: A Sketch of the Life and Times of Baldassare Cossa" (Constable, 10s. 6d.), Mr. Eustace Kitts traverses ground that has been already covered by Bishop Creighton and Mr. Bryce. Of both these writers Mr. Kitts makes good use, and he has produced a readable account of an interesting period in medieval history. Nevertheless, we think that the reader who wishes to understand the relations of the Papacy and the Empire will do better to consult Bryce's "Holy Roman Empire," or the introduction to Creighton's "History of the Papacy," than Mr. Kitts's book. The sub-title led us to expect a biography of Baldassare Cossa, the Neapolitan pirate who rose to the Papacy as John XXIII. The expectation is in some degree fulfilled, but Mr. Kitts is more interested in the Great Schism and the clash of parties which it produced than he seems to be in Cossa's career. As a result, the latter falls into the background, while the book ends with Cossa's elevation to the papal throne in 1410. Mr. Kitts promises another volume, which will complete the story. None the less, we should have felt more grateful had he given us a single book in which he kept closer to the variegated career of his central figure, though, perhaps, it is hardly fair to apply the term to Cossa, for during the period dealt with in the volume before us, he hardly ever plays a leading part. Judged as a history of the Great Schism up to 1410, the work has the merits of clearness and impartiality. Its faults are a tendency to discursiveness and too many quotations from modern text-books. But as an introduction to the ecclesiastical history of the period, it is useful, if wanting in originality.

* * *

Fifty reproductions of old engravings of the London of our ancestors are given in "Old London," compiled by Mr. W. L. McNay (Alexander Moring, 3s. 6d. net), and, facing each picture, is a brief historical account of its subject. The area covered extends, roughly speaking, from the City to Regent Street, including, of course, Westminster and Whitehall. Lovers of London engravings will find much to interest them in this excellently got-up volume. There are a series of capital views of Old London Bridge, with and without its houses, of the Marshalsea Prison, the original Mansion House, the Royal Exchange, the East India House, a fragment of London Wall, as it was standing in the churchyard of St. Giles', Cripplegate, in 1793; pictures of Old St. Paul's, Temple Bar, Somerset House as it was before the Victoria Embankment was built; Westminster Hall, Buckingham Palace, Regent's Quadrant, and views of a host of other houses and streets associated with the history of London's greatness. We are reminded that John Stow, the famous sixteenth century historian of the metropolis, died in great poverty, the sole recompense for his labors being "a license to beg," which was granted by King James. This discouraging example, however, has not deterred a legion of successors from giving the best of their work to the same object as that to which Stow devoted his life, and the London of the past has been reconstructed for us times without number. The picture-book under notice is a useful and inexpensive addition to the library of London lore.

* * *

In view of very recent events in the field of European politics, the volume on "Francis Joseph I.," by Mr. R. P. Mahaffy (Duckworth, 2s. 6d.), is decidedly interesting The present Emperor of Austria-Hungary celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of his accession last year; and the story of his long reign is that of political developments as startling as any to be found in the history of the nineteenth century During this period the map of Europe has been completely altered by the treaties arising out of the successful struggle by Victor Emanuel for Italian freedom and unity, and the Austria-Prussian War of 1866. The Emperor himself, from having been an autocrat of autocratic Hapsburgs, has become a constitutional sovereign. Austria, after being ruled without any Parliament to speak of for nearly twenty years, was granted her constitution in 1867, and now enjoys universal suffrage. Hungary, the second half of the Empire, is only one degree less democratic. These are but the most prominent happenings in a maze of others which Francis Joseph has witnessed and played an active part in The late annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria is discussed in an appendix, and the author takes the view that that much denounced action did not violate the treaty of Berlin, and that the only ground of objection possible must be sought for in the treaty of Paris, which admitted Turkey to the "advantages" of the European Concert. Whatever may be the value of this opinion, no reader can fail to benefit by a study of the facts of Austrian policy, which are succinctly set forth in the text, and which explain the relationship of Austria and Hungary to each other and to the rest of the Continent as clearly and briefly as could be desired.

TOURS.

The R.M.S. DUNOTTAR CASTLE (of the Union-Castle Line) is chartered for a series of cruises as follows :—

£26 5s. 0d. Marseilles, Ajaccio, Athens, Constantinople, Palestine, Egypt, Crete, Naples, Marseilles, March 4th to April 5th.

£21 0s. 0d. PALERMO, Syracuse, Carthage, Tunis, Malta, Naples, Sorrento, Capri, April 8th.

£14 14s. 0d. PALERMO, Tunis, Algiers, Gibraltar, Tangier, Lisbon, April 28th.

Full particulars from Dr. H. S. LUNN, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

THE LEGAL Insurance Company, LTD.

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell,
The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane,
The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Chairman - J. FIELD BEALE, Solicitor.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion.

Write for particulars. HENRY M. LOW, General Manager.

In the March Issue of the Financial Review of Reviews

Attention is directed by LORD ELCHO to an IMPORTANT INVESTMENT ANOMALY IN SOUTH AMERICA.

This Article should be read by all holders of South American Investments.

Other contributors to this number include Professor J. SHIELD NICHOLSON, M.A., D.Sc., Dr. GEORG OBST, Mr. J. A. HOBSON, M.A., &c.

NOTE.—To save disappointment and unnecessary correspondence the Publishers desire to state that the REVIEW deals solely with investment questions. It is, therefore, of no interest to the speculator.

300 pp. Price 1s. nett. 2, Waterloo Place, S.W.

Buy

Because

It

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning. Feb. 19.	Price Friday morning, Feb. 26.
Consols 2½ per cent.	84¼	84
German 3 per cent.	86⅛	86
U.S. Steel Pref.	116¼	110¾
U.S. Steel Common	52	43¾
Union Pacific	183	176⅞
New York Central	130¾	125½

The chief event of the week has been the sharp slump in Wall Street, which occurred on Tuesday, having begun in the London market on Monday. As Mr. Pierpont Morgan and many of the magnates crossed to Europe a few days ago, it is quite likely that they left orders that the market should be allowed to drop down to a suitable level until their return, when fresh manipulation for a rise might be seasonable. One of the reasons given in New York was a decision of the Supreme Court convicting the New York Central of allowing rebates to the American Sugar Refining Company. Really, however, values had become higher than the depressed condition of trade and of the public revenues warranted. It seems, moreover, that the United States Steel Company has at last been compelled to reduce its prices owing to the dwindling demand for its monopolised wares. Altogether the protectionist tariff of the United States seems to be on its last legs, though it is quite likely that the corrupt and corrupting interests may be strong enough to make a last rally and prevent any big reductions in the new tariff. But if they do, Mr. Taft and the Republicans will be hopelessly discredited.

The Money Market and Business.

On Monday £410,000 of gold was withdrawn from the Bank of England for shipment to Buenos Ayres. But an almost equal sum came in from Egypt, and all the supplies available in the open market were secured by the Bank. The monetary situation therefore continues favorable. But as the Income-tax screw is bringing in revenue at a great rate, the market has been compelled to borrow a good deal from the bank, and money has been in demand at quite high rates. Discounts have been a little firmer in consequence. These symptoms, however, are, I think, quite temporary, and if only peace can be maintained in the Near East, the bank rate is more likely to go down than up at the end of this quarter. Indications of improvement in business are still noted, but the continued depression in the United States still causes disappointment. Thanks to the good Indian harvests, trade with the East is recovering. But this is also a slow business, owing to the reduced stock of food stuffs in India.

The Argentine Loan for Battleships.

A telegram from London to the New York papers states that Argentina in her efforts to secure a big loan for armaments, has been confronted with the difficulty that the great financial houses are insisting, as a condition for underwriting it, that the shipbuilding companies in which they are interested must be given the contracts for new Argentine battleships. The telegram continues:—"It is said that Argentina first went to France to secure the money, but having asked the shipbuilding companies of the world, including three American concerns, to tender bids, she could not agree in advance that the ships would be built in France. Argentina then came to England, where one bank made the same stipulation, and negotiations are now going on between another British firm and a commission, consisting of Admirals Garcia and Logos and Captain Montos, the naval attaché to the Argentine Legation here, which is to consider the tenders. The members of the commission will visit British shipyards before making their report. They have been invited to go to America, but it is doubtful if they will have time." This is an interesting sidelight upon the methods that are in vogue now to stimulate the consumption of warlike materials. It would be useful to know a little about the secret relations between European Admiralties and European armament firms. The Argentine loan has gone well enough, and is at a small premium.

Armament Companies' Shares.

Recent movements in armament shares have not been very wide in either direction, and taking four of the most important companies, we find that since the beginning of the year prices have risen in two cases and fallen in the other two. The amount of capital involved is extremely large—so large, in fact, as to make it worth the companies' while to spend money very freely in order to keep their order books full. Of course, the whole of the capital is not employed in the production of guns and warships, as all the firms combine an industrial engineering business with the Admiralty and War Office work. The capital, shares and debentures combined, of four leading armament companies is as follows:—

Vickers, Sons & Maxim	£8,236,000
Armstrong-Whitworth	6,710,000
Cammel-Laird	4,062,890
John Brown & Co.	3,338,000
	£22,346,890

On the ordinary shares Vickers pay a dividend of 15 per cent. per annum; Armstrong Whitworth 15 per cent.; and John Brown & Co. 10 per cent. Cammel, Laird & Co. are, of course, in difficulties at present owing to mismanagement at their works and the difference of opinion between the directors and the Admiralty. But until last year the rate of dividend on the ordinary shares was 10 per cent. The last two dividends due on the preference shares have been passed, and as the dividend is cumulative, and the shares at present stand a point below par, they are obviously very speculative, and when the company can start paying dividends again the price will probably go up with a run. But it is impossible for anyone outside the circle of management to know when the company will begin to make a profit. To trace the movements of prices over a long period, I may give the following comparison between 1898 and 1908:—

	1898.		1908.
	Highest.	Lowest.	Highest.	Lowest.
Vickers ordinary	4¾	2 11-16	2 1-16	1 17.32
Armstrong ...	3⅝	2⅞	2⅞	2 7-16
Cammell-Laird ...	14 5-16	12⅜	5	2 9-16
John Brown ...	1 13-32	1 5-32	1 7-32	1 1-32

The figures in the case of John Brown are for 1899, not 1898. The capital of the various companies has greatly increased during the ten years, owing to amalgamations, &c.

American Wood Pulp and Paper Tariff.

The following comes from Washington:—"The special committee on pulp and paper investigation have held a meeting this morning and have considered various matters which might go into their report, and among them the tariff question. While no definite conclusion was reached, it is understood that the sentiment of the committee is to recommend a considerable reduction in the tariff on cheap print paper and probably the removal of tariff on ground wood under such conditions as would serve the free importation of both pulp wood and ground wood pulp from Canada, and forbid any export tax or other charge by Canada upon either pulp wood, ground wood, or print paper. It is not likely that the tariff on sulphite or soda fibre will be changed. While the committee is composed of four Republicans and two Democrats, it is said that the report of the committee embodying recommendations is likely to be unanimous."

This statement, one learns, was precipitated by the fact that the presence of a large lumber lobby which had been working in Washington for several days was becoming known, and by certain indications that the process of wining and dining was making some converts to the idea of maintaining the duties on lumber and wood products. The announcement gave warning to the lumber people and to those Republicans who were getting ready to join the lumbermen. It foreshadows, in the opinion of good observers, reduction by the Ways and Means Committee, not only as regards those features of wood pulp and paper tariff which are closely connected with the lumber schedule, but also on the timber rates generally. A Washington correspondent adds, however:—"North-Western members who have been looking over the situation with extreme care in the interests of their constituents do not, however, feel at all sure of free lumber. They state that while some radical changes will be made, they believe that the committee will endeavor to leave the schedule as a whole in such shape as to get the maximum revenue from it."

Lucellum.

If you suffer from Liver Complaints

Merit's Liverets will promptly cure you

Prepared, as prescribed by a prominent Physician from purely vegetable ingredients.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

combine both curative and tonic properties, and are especially compounded to avoid that debilitating effect which the majority of Liver medicines produce. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists or direct from MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name, Merit's Liverets, and the signature, Merit & Co. is on the package.
Spurious imitations are useless.

will promptly cure you

MISCELLANEOUS.

COATS OF ARMS and PEDIGREES.—The Author of "A List of Emigrant Ministers to America" will send free to any interested n circular on the legal right to arms.—GERALD FOTHERGILL, 11, Brussels-road, New Wandsworth.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD BIRMINGHAM.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

A SPECIAL OFFER TO SMOKERS.

Have you sampled our Jamaica Cigars (equal to Havanas and half the price)? If not, fill in the following coupon and post to us, together with P.O., Cheque or stamps for 5/-, saying which brand out of this list you prefer, also stating strength you like.

FLOR - - -	80/- per 100	- 5½ ins. long.
CELESTIALS	- 65/- ,, ,,	- 5¼ ,,
IDEALES -	- 45/- ,, ,,	- 6½ ,,
PERFECTES	- 45/- ,, ,,	- 5 ,,
GOVERNORS	- 42/- ,, ,,	- 5 ,,
J. T. C. - -	- 25/- ,, ,,	- 4½ ,,

Our imported Egyptian Cigarettes are the cheapest and best sold on the market. The "Seymour," 6/6 per 100, and "Lord Rothschild" (Gold-tipped), 9/6 per 100. Turkish or Virginian Cigarettes (both Ladies' and Gentlemen's) from 5/6 per 100. Tobacco Mixture: Medium, 10/- per lb.; Mild, 12/- per lb.

If you cannot call and see us fill in this Coupon and post with remittance at once to

JAMRACH & CO.,

199, Piccadilly, London.

CIGAR AND CIGARETTE SPECIALISTS.

Please send me the following goods per return :—

Cigars .....

Cigarettes .....

Tobacco .....

for which I enclose .....

Name .....

Address .....

.....

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.

A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac, etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN MARCH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.

Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation, 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

In the South of Cheshire, four miles from Crewe. Opened in 1900. Modern Buildings with 24 acres of grounds. A Preparatory School in immediate connection with the present School will be opened in May. Application should be made to the HEADMASTER, or to the CLERK TO THE GOVERNORS, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS, Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

EDUCATIONAL.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Principal: MISS AMY KEMP.

BEDFORD GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

Head Master:—J. E. KING, M.A.

An Examination will be held at Bedford on March 9, 10, 11, for 6 Exhibitions (£60—£50), for Boarders and 8 for Day Boys. Apply for particulars to Head Master.

Tettenhall College, Staffs.

For Prospectus, Illustrated Booklet, List of Honours, etc., apply to the Headmaster, R. L. AGER, M.A., late Exhibitioner of Rugby School, and Scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford; formerly Assistant Master and House Master at Bishop's Stortford College.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT

(THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL).

Entrance Scholarship Examination, March 24th and following days. Apply Headmaster, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698 "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

LADY MAY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauser Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON" Telephone No. GERRARD 1854

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh
STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor
MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
THE CROSBY, Withy Grove. The Rendezvous of Lancashire Trade Unions.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.
BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager
ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station
NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment
ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647
HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for HOUGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 056. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE EUSTON
Close to King's Cross and St. Pancras Stations.
THE UNIVERSITY HOTEL
ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, Gordon Square
LONDON

Close proximity to Tube Station for all parts of London. Beautifully Furnished by MAPLE. Comforts and Food Equal to anywhere in London, but prices strictly moderate. Sanitation perfect. Fireproof Floors. Lifts, Baths every floor. Lounge, Billiards. Spacious Dining Room. Write Manager for illustrated Tariff Booklet.

BEDROOM inclusive of Breakfast, Lights, and attendance, from 5/-

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.
THACKERAY HOTEL
Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.
KINGSLEY HOTEL
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." / Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day
PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.
NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate
SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager
ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day
HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

FARNWORTH (Station) Nr. BOLTON.
RAWSON ARMS HOTEL. Theatrical Accommodation

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.
MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

A Selection from

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S

Spring Announcement List, 1909.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, ETC.

A Literary History of the English People. Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. II. By J. J. Jusserand. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A Literary History of Rome. From the Origins to the Close of the Golden Age. By J. Wight Duff, M.A. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Birth of Modern Italy. The Posthumous Papers of Jessie White Mario. Edited with Introduction, Notes and Epilogue, by the Duke Litta-Visconti-Arese. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 40 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Buried City of Kenfig. By Thomas Gray. With a Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Haileybury College. By the Rev. L. S. Milford. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Sir Randal Cremer: A Biography. By Howard Evans. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s.

Eliza Brightwen. The Life and Thoughts of a Naturalist. Edited by W. H. Chesson. With 2 Portraits and an Introduction by Edmund Gosse. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

History of Civilisation. By Charles Seignobos. Vol. I. Ancient Civilisation. II. Mediæval Civilisation. III. Contemporary Civilisation. 5s. net each volume.

SCIENCE AND NATURAL HISTORY.

That Rock Garden of Ours. By Professor F. E. Hulme, F.L.S., F.S.A. With 8 Coloured Plates and 42 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Mysterious Psychic Forces. An Account of the Author's Investigations in Psychical Research, together with those of other European savants. By Camille Flammarion. With 21 Illustrations. 8s. 6d. net.

Psychical Research and the Resurrection. By James H. Hyslop, Ph.D., LL.D. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

How to Study the Stars. By L. Rudaux. With 79 Illustrations. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

CHEAPER EDITIONS.

The Brahmans, Theists, and Muslims of India. By John Campbell Omans, D.Lit. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Economic Interpretation of History. By Professor J. E. Thorold Rogers. La. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Army Reform and Other Addresses. By the Rt. Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION.

The Rise and Progress of the South American Republics. By George W. Crichfield. Illustrated. 2 Vols. Royal 8vo, 25s. net.

Pre-Historic Rhodesia. An Examination of the Ethnological and Archæological Evidences as to the Origin and Age of the Rock Mines and Stone Buildings, with a Gazeteer of Mediæval South Africa. By R. N. Hall. With Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Mexico. Its ancient and Modern Civilisation; History and Political Conditions; Topography and Natural Resources; Industries and General Development. By C. Reginald Enock, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by Martin Hume, a Map, and 64 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Turkey in Revolution. By Charles Roden Buxton. With a Map and 32 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Norfolk and Suffolk Coast. By W. A. Dutt. With about 40 Illustrations. La. Cr. 8vo., 6s. Vol. I. of the County Coast Series.

Through Uganda to Mount Elgon. With Glimpses by the Way. By the Rev. J. B. Purvis. Illustrated with Photographs, 6s.

The Panama Canal and its Makers. By Vaughan Cornish, D.Sc., F.R.G.S. With a Map and 63 Illustrations. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s.

POLITICS AND SOCIOLOGY.

Modern Constitutions. A Collection of the Fundamental Laws of Seventy-Two of the most Important Countries of the World. With Historical Introductions, Notes, and Bibliographies. By Walter Fairleigh Dodd, Ph.D. 21s. 6d. net.

The Workmens Compensation Act, 1906. By V. R. Aronson. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

The Industrial and Commercial Influence of the English Patent System. By A. F. Ravenshear. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

Towards Social Reform. By Canon and Mrs. Barnett. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

Invasion and Conscription. By J. A. Farrer. Paper Boards, 1s. net. Vol. I. of Unwin's Sociology Series.

Write for a copy of Mr. Fisher Unwin's Spring Announcement List. Sent post free on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN,
1, ADELPHI TERRACE.
LONDON, W.C.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Town Planning in Practice. An Introduction to the Art of Designing Cities and Suburbs. By Raymond Unwin. With many Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. Crown 4to, 21s. net.

The Place of Animals in Human Thought. By Countess Martinengo-Cesaresco. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 32 other Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

Chats on English Earthenware. By Arthur Hayden. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 80 Full-page Plates. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

The Papacy: The Idea and its Exponents. By Gustav Kruger. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

The Faith of a Modern Protestant. By Professor W. Bousset. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

No Refuge but in Truth. By Goldwin Smith. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

The Complete Plays of Robert Greene. Edited with Introduction and Notes by Thomas H. Dickinson. Thin Paper Edition, Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; Leather, 3s. 6d. net. A new volume in the Mermaid Series.

Professions for Girls. By T. W. Berry. With a Preface by Lady Grove. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

How to Get Married. By the Author of "How to be Happy Though Married." Paper Covers, 1s.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

Henry in Search of a Wife. By Alphonse Courlander.

Transplanted Daughters. By Mrs. Burton Harrison.

The Canon's Dilemma. By Victor L. Whitechurch.

The Key of Life. By Alice A. Methley.

High Life in the Far East. By James Dalziel.

The Capture of Paul Beck. By M. McDonnell Bodkin.

Olive in Italy. (A new volume in the "First Novel" Library.)

John Broome's Wife. By E. B. Moffat.

The Ways of Men. By Herbert Flowerdew.

THE ADELPHI LIBRARY OF STANDARD FICTION.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

NEW VOLUMES.

Sister Teresa. (Revised Edition.) By George Moore.

Willowdene Will. By Halliwell Sutcliffe.

Tales of Unrest. By Joseph Conrad.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. IV., No. 23.] SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1½d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK	841
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
Liberal Responsibility to Europe	844
True Conceptions of State Help	845
The Possibility of Azeff	846
The Fate of the Free Trade Unionists	848
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
The Latter-Day Prophet	849
The Paralysis of Satire. By G. K. C.	850
The Logician in Parliament	851
The Wind Flowers	852
PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS:—
The Revision of the Prayer Book. By the Rev. Canon H. Hensley Henson	853
THE DRAMA:—
The More or Less Real Woman By William Archer	854
SHORT STUDIES:—
An Ordeal. By Monica Moore	856
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—
Parties in the Italian Elections. By Salvatore Cortesi	857
COMMUNICATIONS:—
The University of London Commission. By a Liberal Graduate	858
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
The Education of Turkish Women. By Isabel Fry	859
Conscription. By Colonel A. Grimshaw Haywood and S.	860
The Policy of the Navy League. By Wm. Caius Crutchley	861
Suffragette Tactics. By Mrs. Gerald Paget	861
Strikes and Unemployment. By the Right Hon. Robert Farquharson	861
"Some Fatuities of Protection." By H. W. Goldberg	861
The "Obedience" of the Clergy. By Presbyter X.	862
A Voice from South Edinburgh. By R. Henderson Smith	862
"British" and "Irish." By James H. Webb	862
POETRY:—
On Expecting Some Books. By William H. Davies	862
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	863
Books to be Read	863
REVIEWS:—
The Tragedy of Boswell's Life	864
The Dilemma of "Modernism"	864
A Great Study-Play	865
Fraser of Lovat	866
Two Novels	867
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
Asser's Life of King Alfred	868
Mars as the Abode of Life	868
Reminiscences of an Old Sportsman	868
Dutch Painting in the Nineteenth Century	868
The Monthly Reviews	870
THE WEEK IN THE CITY	872
SUPPLEMENT:—
Books of the Spring Season	879

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Mr. Roosevelt has left the White House for ever. An American comic paper depicts him driving away in an overloaded cart—packed with bears, heads of moose and deer, portraits and busts of himself, tennis rackets, rifles, revolvers, and copies of "The Strenuous Life." This is the best criticism of Mr. Roosevelt's presidency: it was overloaded with action, much of it futile, and scantily furnished with thought. His quieter successor, Mr. Taft, was inaugurated in a blizzard, which came four years late, and prevented the President-elect from delivering his inaugural address in front of the Capitol. Mr. Taft's address reflects, on the whole, conservative Republicanism, and his adherence to the Roosevelt domestic "policies" is probably weak. On the other hand, it is nominally Imperialist, emphasising the need for naval expansion. No diminution of the tariff is promised by the double affirmation of a tariff high enough to equalise the cost of production at home and abroad, and a threat of applying the maximum to unfriendly competitors—a threat which leaves a Free Trade country untouched. But Mr. Carnegie has shown that the cost of producing steel is lower in America than here, so that this ground is a slippery one for the high Protectionists. On the whole we fancy Mr. Taft leans to a reduction of the higher rates. Revenue he must have, in order to fill up the deficit of £20,000,000 sterling, and this can only be obtained by a lowering of the tariff. The only personal note is the invitation to the South to advance to a general educational franchise in place of a forcible exclusion of the colored vote.

* * *

The Austro-Servian crisis has not yet ended, and the blame for its prolongation rests chiefly with Austria. Russia acceded so far to the proposal of a joint intervention at Belgrade as to advise the Servian Government to abandon the claim for territorial compensation. Servia has not taken this step, and Austria is giving her no encouragement to do so. The semi-official "Fremdenblatt" tells Servia that she must give up all pretensions with regard to Bosnia, acknowledge that she has no locus standi, and then discuss any question of economic concessions direct with Austria. This means that Servia must be humiliated, and abandon the support of powerful intermediaries. Equally uncompromising are the declarations made by Dr. Wekerle, the Hungarian Premier, and Count Tisza, an Hungarian ex-Premier. The stiff attitude of Austria has certainly been the chief obstacle in the way of a settlement, and it has made a very bad impression throughout Europe. Even the German Press criticises the Austrian Government severely, not only Radical papers like the "Berliner Tageblatt" and the "Frankfurter Zeitung," but high Conservative papers like the "Kreuz-Zeitung." The "Kreuz-Zeitung" bluntly says that the determining motive in the situation is not peace or national interests, but a duel between M. Isvolsky and Baron Aehrenthal.

* * *

Mr. Falconer, a Scottish Liberal of considerable ability and standing, was elected member for Forfarshire on Saturday by a majority of 2,452. The Liberal majority in 1906 was 3,519, but no serious politician takes 1906 as a normal or index year. On no other occasion did the Liberal majority rise much beyond a third of Mr. Falconer's surplus, and in 1894 a Conservative was elected. In 1900, a year of Tory reaction, Mr. Sinclair's majority was only 248. The chief issues in the contests were the Scottish Land Bill and Free Trade. On Thursday South Edinburgh returned Mr. Dewar by a majority of 1,221. This is a decline of 1,739 on 1906, but at only one other election—that of 1886—was the majority so large.

* * *

Central Glasgow tells a somewhat different tale. Mr. Scott-Dickson, a former Glasgow member, was elected by a majority of 2,113. The seat was always Conservative until the late Sir A. M. Torrance, an ideal Glasgow candidate, carried it at the last election by a majority of 431. The "Times" claims the result in one leader as a victory for Protection, and in another as a defeat of Home Rule. It is probable that the latter was the more conspicuous factor. The "Glasgow Herald," the ablest of the Scottish Unionist newspapers, which did much to destroy the effect of Mr. Chamberlain's first Protectionist crusade in Glasgow, urged Free Trade Unionists to vote for Mr. Scott-Dickson on the ground that, though a Protectionist, he could never carry Protection, and that Free Traders need not, therefore, be "superstitiously" high-principled. Mr. Gibson Bowles fought a most spirited battle, but he was, perhaps, too brilliant a candidate for Central Glasgow, which preferred the tempered radiancy of Mr. Scott-Dickson.

* * *

The Army Estimates for 1909-10 show a total of £27,435,000. This is an apparent decrease of £24,000 as compared with 1908-9, but a real rise of £276,000. The nominal saving is obtained by levying an additional contribution of £300,000 from the Indian Government towards the cost of raising and training the British Army in India. The Territorial force has involved an increase of £355,000, though as yet it is far from its full strength, and is still about 10,000 short of the old Volunteers. The reports as to its training and organisation are good. There is a reduction of 1,800 men in the regular army owing to the return from South Africa of one cavalry regiment and four battalions of infantry. This brings about an exact balance between the number of battalions serving abroad and their feeders at home. As 11,000 men still remain in South Africa, there should be further economies in this direction at the first moment when South Africa, Dutch and English, is ready for them. On the other hand the Egyptian garrison is being stiffened.

* * *

Mr. Haldane's presentment of these Estimates on Thursday revealed some sharp criticism of his recruiting tactics for the Territorials, and of his sketch of an Imperial Army consisting of 23 corps. Sir Charles Dilke called this mere "Germanisation," likely to repel Australia, and to create "alarm or ridicule." As to the Alliance Assurance scheme, it was bad for the Territorials, for a man pressed to join by one firm which recruited for it would be handicapped by another which was unfavorable. The same protest was raised by Mr. Ward, Mr. Seddon, Sir Ivor Herbert, and even by Mr. Arnold-Forster, who objected to compulsion by employers. Mr. Forster's other main criticisms were that Mr. Haldane was spending £275,000 more for 100,000 fewer men, and that the Special Reserve was a sham. On the other hand, it was agreed that the Territorial scheme and training were good, and that, as Mr. Francis Acland showed in a very interesting speech, the standard of the soldier's life was rising.

* * *

Mr. Lloyd George made an interesting reply on Monday to criticism of the administration of the Pensions Act. He said that the Act had revealed the extent of the secret, heroic struggle against poverty which had been going on throughout the land. As an example he gave the case of an old lady of seventy-five who earned on an average 6s. 6d. per week, paid 3s. 6d. of it in rent, lived on the remaining 3s., and yet had £11 in the Savings Bank as an insurance against a pauper funeral. As to the case of Ireland, where wholesale fraud was strongly alleged by Mr. Balfour and other speakers, neither Mr. Lloyd George nor Mr. Birrell would admit anything more than "laxity" of administration in a country full of poor and outworn people who, owing to the absence of birth registers, did not accurately know their ages. An administrative inquiry has been ordered. Mr. George's general conclusion was that almost the whole community entitled to pensions had applied at once, the reluctance shown in other countries not being visible. The total cost of the present system was eight millions, which he thought the wealthiest of communities would not grudge for so human an end, but there was a chance of this sum growing to eleven millions.

* * *

Mr. Burns was sharply criticised by the Labor Party on Tuesday and Wednesday for his administration of the Unemployed Act. The chief complaints were that he had starved Labor Colonies like the farm at Hollesley Bay and the Women's Workrooms, that he had refused to start Distress Committees in districts which needed them, and had cut down opportunities for relief work in Manchester and elsewhere when they were sorely needed. Mr. Burns's reply on the two latter points seems convincing, but Mr. Balfour did not accept his theory that the Hollesley Bay experiment was to be condemned merely because of its high cost or its uneconomic character, and properly suggested that its educative and human value should also have been taken into account. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald insisted that the Local Government Board had barred out all prospects of the Colonists getting access to the land, and confined the scope of the experiment to mere relief work. Mr. Balfour's verdict on Mr. Burns's administration was that he had acted with courage but not "in the best possible manner." Mr. Balfour thought that there might be some good in labor exchanges and in a limited redistribution of public and private work between good and bad times. Different remedies were wanted for different evils. But first it is necessary to distinguish between the unemployed and the unemployable.

* * *

A committee of the French Cabinet has been revising the draft tariff in conjunction with the Commission of the Chamber. The Cabinet and the Commission are agreed as to the majority of schedules, and the Commission has made some concessions. The revised draft will come before the whole Cabinet in a few days, and the next stage will be to submit it to the Chamber. It is expected that the Chamber will pass the tariff in the course of the present Session. At the meeting of the Association of Chambers of Commerce Mr. Walter Behrens, of the Paris Chamber of Commerce, explained that the framers of the tariff had shown considerable readiness to spare English susceptibilities, and that the French Government had pledged itself to oppose any arrangement likely to disturb the present excellent economic relations between France and Great Britain.

* * *

The Association passed two resolutions, one calling the British Government's attention to the situation, and the other recommending a commercial treaty. It is noteworthy that Mr. Churchill on Wednesday, this time specifically in connection with the French tariff, repeated his approval of retaliation when "demonstrably to the general and permanent advantage of the trade of this country," and his resolution not to "tie the hands of this country" in all circumstances. We suppose Mr. Churchill has a plan, but when did retaliation ever secure an advantage for the State that used it? With regard to a commercial treaty it should be observed that the abolition of commercial treaties was part of the Méline Protectionism, and that a law of 1891 forbids commercial conventions of longer duration than twelve months.

* * *

After a trial lasting over three months the Zulu chief Dinizulu has been found guilty upon two of the twenty-three counts in the indictment against him, viz., for harboring members of the family of the "rebel" Bambata, and for not delivering up some other "rebels" who took refuge in his kraal after the "rebellion" was ended. Though the evidence given at the trial is not to hand, we may assume that it was proved that he or his tribesmen did conceal the fugitive wife of Bambata and some other miserable homeless refugees after the great slaughter of 1906. When it is remembered that the whole country had been subjected to the illegal operation of martial law, under which whole tribes of unresisting Zulus were driven into the forests after their kraals had been burnt, this offence of succoring a few of his destitute countrymen can hardly be considered a heinous crime. The original charges of murder and incitement to murder, freely uttered against him by the Natal authorities, were not put in the indictment, and upon all the major counts, including charges of rebellion and conspiracy, collecting arms and so forth, he was acquitted.

* * *

But in the heavy penalty of four years' and one year's imprisonment on the two charges the enemies of Dinizulu have secured their end—his removal from his country and, presumably, his deposition from the position of paramount chief. Though we cannot comment on the conduct of the trial itself, we may remind readers that this condemnation is the culmination of a long series of accusations directed against the son of Cetewayo ever since his return from exile in 1898, which when put to the test were shown to be destitute of all foundation. The impropriety and injustice of the conduct of the authorities prior to this trial have been subjected to well-deserved reprobation. Without formulating any charge, General McKenzie arrested him in December, 1907, issuing a proclamation to the effect that he would never be permitted to return to his country. For more than a year he was kept in close confinement until sufficient evidence could be secured on which to base a charge, his legal advisers being meanwhile prevented, under martial law, from entering the country to collect evidence for his defence. Such is the administration of justice in Natal.

* * *

The German financial problem is not appreciably nearer a solution. The Reichstag Committee has rejected the Government's death duties proposal and the National Liberal proposal for an Imperial property tax, but it has not yet discussed the Conservative-Clerical compromise put forward by its sub-committee. The Secretary to the Treasury sticks to his original view, and the Finance Ministers are doing their best to push the death duties scheme. They object to the Conservative-Clerical idea of a property tax raised by the State for Imperial purposes as "imperilling the federal character of the Empire." There are, it will be seen, a constitutional and a political problem superimposed upon a purely financial problem. Prince Bülow has called into council the leaders of the groups of the bloc, and negotiations for a compromise are actively proceeding; Prince Bülow no doubt hopes that the Liberals and Radicals will be made tractable by the fear of the bloc giving way to a Conservative-Clerical combination as the parliamentary engine of the Government. If a compromise is reached it is pretty certain not to include the death duties so obnoxious to the Agrarians, though there may be some extension of the legacy duties, and it is equally likely to make good any deficiency in revenue by increased indirect taxation. The poor will bear the heavier burden because the parliamentary majority consists of the rich.

* * *

There is no decisive change in the Persian situation. The expeditions against the Nationalists of Ispahan and Resht have halted a short way out of Teheran, and the Shah is evidently concentrating against Tabriz, calculating that if that city falls the whole revolutionary movement must collapse. An assault was made on Tabriz from those quarters; the Royalists gained a slight advantage on the N.E. side, but were repulsed with some loss elsewhere. The town, however, remains blockaded. All the roads are beset, and supplies have been cut off for the last fortnight. Apparently, however, Katai Khan has food enough for another six weeks. In an interview the Shah has made it quite clear that his mind remains unchanged. He thinks the old Megliss was an anarchic institution, and he will do nothing in the way of concession until he has crushed all opposition and cowed the nation. Representations from the foreign Powers are not likely to affect him, especially as Sir Edward Grey says that the granting of an amnesty has formed part of all suggestions that have been under consideration. The leading Persian statesmen, the "able and energetic" men of the country, are in exile, and will not be permitted to return if the Shah can prevent it.

* * *

The International Opium Commission which assembled at Shanghai on February 1st separated after three weeks without accomplishing much. It passed nine resolutions, the chief of which recognised "the unswerving sincerity" of the Chinese Government and "the real, though unequal, progress" made in suppressing the opium habit, urged all Governments to take drastic measures to control the sale, manufacture, and distribution of morphine, and recommended the foreign settlements in China to close the divans as soon as possible, and to negotiate with the Chinese Government to prohibit the sale and manufacture of anti-opium medicine containing opium. The most effective measure—a general agreement to prohibit the growth of the poppy—was not adopted, nor did the Chinese Government get its way on the matters nearest to its heart—the reduction of the importation of opium pari passu with the reduction of the growth of the poppy in China and the establishment of a Government opium monopoly there. The Chinese Government claims that it will have stamped out the cultivation of the poppy in two years, whereas the Indian Government will take ten years in abolishing the export of opium. Direct negotiations between the two Governments may, however, lead to a better arrangement. Opium monopolies have been attempted in several of the provinces, but in every case they broke down before the protests of the foreign consuls—including, one regrets to say, English consuls—on the ground that they were an infringement of treaty obligations.

* * *

Our Paris correspondent writes:—"The Minister of Education, as everyone anticipated, has appointed M. Loisy to the professorship of the history of religions at the Collège de France. Any other appointment would have been abnormal and unjustifiable; the choice of the professors of the college is almost always ratified by the Minister, and in the very few cases in which it has been passed over, there were special reasons for that course. Thus the refusal to appoint Père Scheil, the Dominican, to the chair of Assyriology was based on the ground that a member of a religious order is not a free agent and is unable to deal with any subject from a purely scientific standpoint. In the present case it would have been more than absurd to pass over the greatest French authority on the history of religions in favor of a young Egyptologist who has given no attention to the question outside his own special branch of it. Had the vacant chair been a chair of Egyptology, M. Foucart might have been a very suitable person."

[This number of The Nation contains a supplement dealing with publishers' announcements of books to be issued this spring.]

Politics and Affairs.

LIBERAL RESPONSIBILITY TO EUROPE.

> "The people of our Christian world live like animals, guided in their lives merely by personal interests and by their struggle with one another; differing from animals only in that the animals, from time immemorial, have kept the same stomachs, claws and fangs, while people move with ever-increasing rapidity from roads to railroads, from horses to steam, from spoken sermons and letters to printing, to telegraphs and telephones, and from sailing boats to ocean steamers, from swords to gunpowder, cannons, quick-firing guns, bombs, and war-aeroplanes. And life with telegraphs, telephones, electricity, bombs, and aeroplanes, and with hatred of all for all; directed, not by some uniting spiritual principle, but, on the contrary, by animal instincts which divide, and which employ mental powers for their own satisfaction, becomes ever more and more insane and wretched."—Tolstoy in the "Fortnightly Review."

The Government cannot, we think, complain that in the controversy on armaments it has been left without plain indications of the mind and will of its followers. The Executive of the National Liberal Federation, which speaks the mind of the moderates of the party, and is not usually left without official guiding, has unanimously revised an earlier resolution admitting the necessity for an increase on naval expenditure, and has substituted for it another motion, declaring that, in its opinion, no necessity for any such increase exists. Two other bodies of influence, the National Reform Union and the New Reform Club, have spoken in the same sense. A large body of Liberal members of Parliament have ballotted for a motion of discussion and criticism of the Navy Estimates. Powerful reasons exist for this movement of vigilance and alarm. Already the mark of heavy warlike expenditure is visible in the wearing down of the programme of social reform. The promise of legislation removing the disability which shuts out the aged workhouse inmate from a share in the pensions fund has been dropped. The Prime Minister's further pledge of an energetic dealing with the problem of unemployment has been reduced by the omission from the King's Speech of a measure of afforestation, and we do not see how a programme involving the building of four "Dreadnoughts" this year and possibly six the next is compatible with a measure of insurance for invalidity and unemployment. Unprincipled journalists, Liberal as well as Tory, are not wanting to assure the Liberal Party that its pledges of social reform, explicit and implicit, are valueless in comparison with the demands of the war services; while a Cabinet Minister spends his energies in creating an atmosphere equally unfavorable to economy and to peace. Take the Army Estimates, as to which the pledges of reduction are, as it were, ten deep. Mr. Haldane prides himself on a reduction of £24,000. There is no real reduction. The estimates of expenditure are on an increased scale, notably in respect of the cost of the Territorial Army, and the so-called saving is merely obtained by dragging an extra £300,000 out of India as an increased contribution to the raising and training of the British Army there. Mr. Haldane has, indeed, one source of economy in the gradual withdrawal of the South African garrison, as a result of the settlement of the racial question and the creation of a single self-governed community. But of this he has only availed himself to a limited extent, while on the other hand he presents an assured and continual source of increased expenditure in the growth of the Territorial Army. It is already clear that this force, though smaller in number than the Yeomanry and Volunteers whom it replaces, will be far more costly. In the last year of the existence of these bodies, we maintained 250,259 officers and men at a cost of £1,894,159. Mr. Haldane has now enrolled about 240,000 officers and men, and his estimate of the cost of the force during the present year is £2,307,000. This is a large excess, even if we make due allowance for the additional expense incurred in the more careful training of the new forces as compared with the old.

However, this is only a measure of Mr. Haldane's most innocent activities. The country might consent to pay a little more for effective volunteering. But the Secretary for War is engaged in an agitation for popularising the Territorial Army, and he has employed three auxiliaries—a sensational halfpenny newspaper, a melodrama written to further conscription, and an Assurance Company whose directors have most improperly decided to exclude from their service all but members of the Territorial Army. This ukase of Lord Rothschild Mr. Haldane has expressly approved, though it is clear that if a sufficient number of employers adopted it, the road to conscription would be made broad and plain. The whip of unemployment would be used to drive young men of the middle classes into military service, and the passage from this kind of pressure to force exercised directly by the State would be inevitable, and, indeed, would be demanded by workers and employers alike. It is no fault of Mr. Haldane's that both these classes have repudiated the invasion of personal liberty which he has excused and applauded; and we think it matter of grave public scandal that a statesman having high office in a Liberal Government should be permitted to profess such views, and to hold the threat of forced service over the heads of free British citizens. Already insurance clerks who do not care for soldiering are given warning that, so far as two important companies are concerned, their sphere of employment is restricted, and if the field had been narrowed a little more, this body of workers must either have fought "conscriptionist" houses or yielded. Such an issue cannot be allowed to rest. If Mr. Haldane chooses to make his own creation unpopular, and substitute for the young enthusiasts of last year men driven into training by the hunger-whip, that is his own affair. But so long as he is a Liberal Minister he cannot be allowed to move one step towards the tragic blunder of Conscription.

The incident will, we hope, convince Liberals and Radicals that, now as ever, they have not a single cause to defend, but a general policy and point of view. Free Trade does not stand alone. It is a pledge of the general security of British democracy against the combined attack of Protection, Conscription, Militarism, and Imperialism, and no Government which is not determined to fight all these tendencies at once can long retain or deserve the name of Liberal. For all these influences in their several ways imply the denial of moral force; all base themselves on doctrines abhorrent to the teaching of the great progressive thinkers and statesmen —Mill, Spencer, Gladstone, Cobden, Bright; all misuse and debase the instruments of science and civilisation; all imply the helplessness and economic depression of the peoples. If, within six years of the close of the South African War, we are again visited by these allied and co-operative spirits, the proof is clear that in armaments and in the unending increase of armaments resides, not security, but the very demon of insecurity. We never were so safe, and we never felt more unsafe. Nature has provided us with the most secure of frontiers, and yet we spend millions more on defence, and are more alarmed about "security," than any of the European Powers with merely land barriers against their rivals. The greater our fleet, the greater we want it to be. The more science accumulates the power of enabling attacked and invaded countries to destroy an aggressive enemy, the more helpless we believe ourselves. The reason is that a universal scepticism and superstition hold the most powerful of modern States, each fearing the other, and believing it to be devoid of its own innocent and upright policy, while in each country the same type of perverted mind builds up the same arguments for increasing that material force which is the cause of our unrest, as it is the poison to which each patient has almost equal access. There is therefore no relief by way of armaments, for science, with its last invention, supplies all the nations with the means of neutralising the discovery that preceded it. Steadily these Christian, equally civilised, Powers—no longer ringed round with a barbarian world, as was ancient Rome, but sharing a common and continually enriched endowment of faith and knowledge—press each other to the gulf of common ruin, and, by a strange moral blindness, greet every advance to the precipice as a victory of peace. Two organised political forces only seem to exist to combat these tendencies. They are the British Liberal and Labor Parties and Continental Socialism. Liberalism is, for the moment, the most important of these instruments for redeeming modern society from its craze for violence. Great therefore is its responsibility, measureless must be the consequences of a false step on this question of armaments. For if the Liberal Party now abandons or qualifies its central doctrine, it will not only destroy itself, but will open the way to a worse Europe than that of 1819.

TRUE CONCEPTIONS OF STATE HELP.

The Old Age Pensions Act has cost more than was expected, and the excessive number of Irish claims probably indicates defects in the machinery which will have to be made good. Nevertheless the effect of the debate on the Supplementary Estimates has been to confirm the sense of satisfaction—we may almost say of profound relief—with which the public contemplate the provision for the aged poor. Mr. Lloyd George struck the right note when he dwelt on the mass of unacknowledged and undisclosed poverty which the Act had revealed. The true pathos of poverty is not to be seen in the listlessness and apathy of the workhouse or in the squalor of the miserable crowd that huddles away from wind or snow under the arches of Waterloo Bridge. Such poverty has become destitution and ruin, and in becoming destitution it has put off its human aspect for something hardly human; it has exchanged its pathos for horror. The true pathos of the poor is seen rather in the bare but decent home, in the unending yet unavailing struggle with the inevitable, in the pinched lip closing in after the long years of unrequited toil unrelieved by hope and uncheered by a rest which involves either dependence or privation. From this blank ending the pension system is rescuing the mass of the poor, and when it is extended, as extended it must be, by abolishing the disqualification of poor relief, it will go far to solve the problem of poverty for the aged. It will hold out a hope to the worker whose faculties are decaying, and who becomes aware that he cannot long trust to his own hands to maintain him; it will afford a possibility to son or daughter of maintaining the parents without unduly burdening their own families. It will stimulate energy and thrift, and arrest the weakening of the family tie. This it achieves because it throws over the previous destitution test, and instead of confining relief to those who are perhaps too far gone upon the road to ruin to make good use of it, holds out the hand to all who need.

It is the same principle which the Minority of the Poor Law Commissioners would have extended to all forms of public assistance. The Commissioners of 1832-4 taught us to seek economy by restriction. Relief had been given with so little discrimination that it had become a mere grant in aid of wages, pauperising not only the independent laborer, but even in a sense the farmer who employed him. To escape from these abuses the New Poor Law sought stringent tests to distinguish the case of real need from the case which was spurious or undeserving, and the more efficiently it was administered the more it strove to throw on every man to the last stroke of his ability the responsibility of maintaining himself. Under certain imaginable economic circumstances this might, in fact, be the best course. If there were what two generations ago there was sometimes supposed to be, a system of free industrial enterprise with a mobile labor market, wherein every man of normal human faculties could find his place and his wage, if there were no unemployment but that due to sickness, if there were no sweated industries or swollen rent-rolls, if wages were fixed on a scale to make ample provision for an average family and leave a margin to provide for sickness, misfortune, and old age, then it might be best for each family to stand on its own feet and take on itself the responsibility for all these contingencies of life. Then it would be possible to treat the man who had fallen out of the ranks of industry as an idler, and him who had failed to make due provision as a spendthrift. At least it would be possible to leave the few exceptional cases to private charity, and all that the Poor Law would have to do would be to stand between the wastrel and sheer starvation. But the excellence of the social system itself would separate the sheep from the goats. We might be sure that all who failed failed by their own fault. The newer methods of the State towards poverty have arisen because none of these conditions are fulfilled, nor are they in a fair way to be fulfilled. Free competition does not provide assured employment for all, not even for many who are thoroughly competent and respectable. It does not supply a "living wage" for perhaps a quarter, perhaps a third, of the population. It sentences them to a monotony of dull and de-humanising toil, with no prospect of betterment, and no hope of rest as the eyes grow dim and the limbs grow feeble. That many of this class, as of others, makes things far worse for themselves by drink and waste is true. But to combat drink and waste the best of all means is to supply the stimulus of hope—that is, to hold out the prospect not of impeccable and unredeemed dreariness, but of reasonable comfort and human conditions as the reward to be gained by a life of industry and self-control. To hold out this hope it is necessary not to reserve all public assistance for the utterly destitute, but to lend a hand to those who have not yet sunk into destitution, to redress in some small degree the heavy balance of economic forces, and secure to the citizen, as citizen, some lien upon that vast accumulation of wealth which is always in large measure a social product.

The other side of a more liberal and humane conception of public assistance for the poor is the added necessity for the sharper discrimination between poverty and pauperism, and the more rigid treatment of the essential pauper. Pauperism is not properly an economic condition. It is much more a type of character, and the vice of our present Poor Law system is that it tends, especially in such an institution as the workhouse, to confound these widely different classes. The remedy widely favored and suggested by the Majority Report is to refer the work of discrimination to the expert in philanthropy, who passes his life in sifting cases, examining records, and adjudicating claims to relief. We cannot, however, suppose that Parliament will ever consent to taking the administration of relief so far out of the hands of representative authorities as is suggested in this Report. Charitable societies, Guilds of Help, Church organisations, will always have an important rôle to play alongside of the State organisation. That rôle will be something more than the Minority conceive, for the best individual work is not done, as they seem to suggest, in connection with institutions, but in the medium of direct personal relationships. But it will be a good deal less than the Majority desire, for public funds must be administered by representatives of the ratepayers, and the charitable organisations of the country have not acquired such a reputation for combined feeling and judgment as will induce the public to confide the task to their hands. Much less will it allow them, as seems contemplated in the treatment of the unemployed, to set the standard of permissible relief, so that whatever is done for a man by a public authority must be "in some way less eligible" than the treatment which he would have received from organised charity. Legislation on questions so large and complex as those dealt with in the recent Reports can only proceed piecemeal, and we do not suppose that the question of the authority to be substituted for the present Guardians will be broached until the suggestions have had time to sink in and there is more general agreement as to the proper substitute than would now be found. But we think it clear that no progressive Government would accept the main ideal underlying the recommendations of the Majority, that the appropriate organ for administering public assistance is a committee of private representatives of organised charity.

THE POSSIBILITY OF AZEFF.

"Our safety," said the Minister of Police in the Roi des Montagnes, as he avowed his complicity with the brigands; "our safety lies in the fact that we are so utterly improbable." About's malicious epigram might with propriety be adopted by the Russian bureaucracy. It survives in Europe because it is so incredibly un-European. Scandal follows scandal, and still it survives, sustained by loans, alliances, and understandings, because the scandals require for their comprehension a background and environment which it is beyond the powers of the untravelled Englishman or Frenchman to conceive. The few who know the facts hesitate to unmask them, lest they themselves should be broken by the impenetrable incredulity of Western common sense. But the accumulation of crimes of which the Azeff affair is only the last is now so considerable that it is tempting to group the facts together. Isolated they seem monstrous. Collected they present a certain coherence and internal consistency, which makes a possible, if topsy-turvy, world. The main thing to remember is that we are dealing with a society in which there is neither public control nor unified discipline. There has never been in Russia a single government, but always many. There was before 1905 no Cabinet; there were only separate Ministers, each struggling for the favor of the Autocrat. The arbiter among these arch-officials was necessarily the Court, and the Court meant in practice the Grand Duke, the great lady, the financial adventurer, or the "practical mystic" who had for the moment the ear of the Tsar. Outside the Ministries stand certain chiefs of the secret police, responsible only to the Tsar, directed by some exalted detective who has his confidence, and is usually at war with one or more of the Ministers. In the provinces, under the perennial states of siege or "exceptional protection," the local governors, only partially responsible to the Ministry of the Interior, rule as little independent despots, and generally rely for their immunity on the favor of the secret police, which ultimately means the Tsar or his courtiers. The object of most of these official persons is naturally to "make their careers," and the way to make them is not so much through public service or popular repute, as by winning the favor of one or other of the factions which intrigue in secret in the corridors of the palace or the bureaux of the political police.

Into this chaotic world is it possible to fit the monstrous figure of Azeff? Let us first consider some of its other known tenants, and the methods of which they stand convicted. Plehve's master-idea is now fairly well-known and established by authentic testimony. At the moment when Socialism began to spread among the industrial workers, he created a police trade union, whose object was to lure the men into strikes, in the hope of more easily drawing out and marking down their leaders. Father Gapon was himself an agent of this system, and owed his success largely to the belief of the police that the priest-demagogue was really their man. Certainly he was in their pay, but, like Mirabeau, he at first took bribes without allowing himself to be corrupted. Through Gapon the Secret Police provoked to insurrection, intending to crush it utterly. Perhaps the most lurid revelation of the power and malignity of the organisation which controls the lives and liberties of a hundred millions of the Tsar's subjects, came with Prince Urussoff's disclosures of the part which it played in organising the massacres of Jews. It directed the "Black Hundreds," used the military and the ordinary police as its tools, and camped in the Ministry of the Interior (unknown to Count Witte), where it safely printed its proclamations inciting to slaughter. The man who drafted these proclamations was Ratchkovsky, now better known as Azeff's immediate employer. He survived that scandal as he had survived others. It was Count Witte who fell. Ratchkovsky survived because his patrons were the then omnipotent General Trepoff, and the Tsar himself. For if one fact about this chaos is clearer than another, it is that the Tsar publicly supported and eulogised the "Black Hundreds" during the period of their most sinister activity.

Concerning Azeff certain facts are now, since the inconclusive debates in the Duma, beyond dispute. He was, as M. Stolypin admitted, a police agent from 1892 onwards. He was also by the Prime Minister's admission deep in the counsels of the terrorist organisation between 1906 and 1908. He took part in the organisation of many attempts during those years, and his justification according to M. Stolypin was that most of them failed. That is in effect an admission that he instigated young men and women to crimes, whose successful execution he none the less prevented. M. Stolypin was not explicit, but it is asserted that during these two years Azeff took part in promoting the Moscow rising, and the Cronstadt and Sveaborg mutinies. It is true that these risings brought disaster on the revolution, but it was at the cost of thousands of lives. A spy would have betrayed these plots in such a way as to cause them to fail by the premature arrest of the conspirators. Azeff's rôle was rather that of a general paid to lead the enemy into bloody disaster. But by fixing the date of Azeff's real influence over the revolution in the year 1906, M. Stolypin evaded the more startling questions concerning Azeff's past. The fact is that as early as 1903 Azeff was the supreme head of the inner Terrorist Organisation of the Revolutionary Socialists. That fact and all it implies was generally assumed in the Duma debate, notably by M. Miliukoff. It is established by the official report of the party, by the independent testimony of Russians who knew him, but are themselves outside this party, notably Prince Kropotkin and the able writer who contributes a page of history to the "English Review" over the initials "D. S." The present writer has had the advantage of discussing Azeff's past with a Russian Socialist who knew him intimately through all those years, and explained his influence in the party solely by his uncanny success in organising terrorism. This authority was, indeed, inclined to think that Azeff's treason to the party had been gradual and comparatively recent. That theory, however, is negatived by M. Stolypin's own statement. Azeff represented the Secret Police within the party all the time and from his earliest connection with it. It is difficult to reject the statements of the party itself that Azeff organised the murders of Plehve and the Grand Duke Sergius, and was even present as an active participant in the assassination of the former.

At this point the real mystery begins. The secret police, who knew what was Azeff's position in the party, must also have known that he had at least a foreknowledge of the plots against Plehve and the Grand Duke Sergius. Why, then, did it allow him to conduct these plots to a successful conclusion? Was it simply to permit him to win the full confidence of the real terrorists in order afterwards to destroy them? Or did Azeff himself deceive both his police paymasters and his terrorist comrades? Or was the secret police using him for its own purposes, to remove its own enemies within the bureaucracy and at court? The last theory, the most monstrous and improbable of all, seems also the best to fit the facts. Ratchkovsky, who organised Jewish massacres, would not have hesitated at murder; Ratchkovsky was Azeff's immediate employer, and he is said to have had a personal feud with Plehve, whom Azeff helped to assassinate. The final improbability confronts us when we are assured by those who have examined the documents that Azeff, the police agent, was more than once engaged in plots against the Tsar's own life, which failed through no fault of his. Before rejecting even that last monstrous suggestion, it is well to recall the rather lurid history of the Russian Court and the Romanoff dynasty. Court plots, which might include as a detail the removal of a sovereign, seem to us an impossible anachronism, because our own history has been free from them since the reign of James I. and the Gowrie conspiracy. But only a century separates the Russia of to-day from the Tsar Paul and a succession of dynastic conspiracies complicated by murder, insanity, and queenly gallantries.

For the whole truth about the career of Azeff we may have to wait until the Secret Police has left its records to be studied coldly and critically as historians to-day unravel the infamies of the Bastille documents. We know enough, however, to suspect that there is a subterranean government in Russia, often stronger than the Ministry, capable, perhaps, even of challenging the person of a feeble Tsar, which uses as its instruments indifferently the police, the terrorists, and the "Black Hundreds." That M. Stolypin knows little of its doings and cannot control them, we readily believe. He does not even know how many thousands of victims it yearly sends untried by "administrative process" into exile. Its psychology and its morals must resemble more closely those of some Camorra than any police organisation which the Western mind can conceive. It is a counter-terrorism, differing only from an avowedly anarchist league in the fact that its members are propagating no principles, but merely fighting a nation, and incidentally amassing wealth and seeking promotion. Sometimes it makes terms (as at Moscow) with brigands of the Tottenham stamp, who share with it the proceeds of "expropriations," Sometimes, as was stated by a Cadet member in the Duma debate, a male detective disguised as a young woman will lead a girl's school to some "revolutionary" act, which will condemn several young women to prison or exile. Sometimes (as was proved in a recent trial at Vladivostock) it will procure the hanging of men by hiding forged documents in their rooms, sealed with a revolutionary seal which it has fabricated. There is, in short, nothing to distinguish the doings of this secret police from those of the Turkish spies employed by the Yildiz camarilla. It will last while the autocracy endures, and while it lasts it will produce a perpetual duality in the government of Russia. Nothing can end that duality, save a frank acceptance of constitutional rule. Nothing now sustains it but the complacence of European diplomacy and European finance.

THE FATE OF THE FREE TRADE UNIONISTS.

If the Liberal Party watch with closeness the signs of public opinion, as the bye-elections reveal its movements, they will, we think, find no reason for discouragement. There are many signs that the country is passing over and through the reaction which undoubtedly set in during the progress of the Licensing Bill. The bad series of elections, starting from Peckham, began with that measure, and it now shows signs of closing. There is nothing surprising in this phenomenon. The friends of the Licensing Bill never expected it to be popular. They had lately emerged from a battle for cheap food for the people; it was easy for a well-organised trade, familiar with working-class habit, to pretend that the Bill meant dear, or worse still, inconvenient, drink. But now that the brewer and his friends have won, we come back to issues more easily expounded. The Tory Party and its leader have hung out the old forlorn banner of taxes on the people's bread, meat, and roof-trees, and behind it they are beginning stealthily to advance the standard of Conscription. They have cavilled and sneered at old age pensions, and they have been compelled to withdraw or hedge on their sporting offer to do away with unemployment. When these issues are again thoroughly canvassed in England, popular opinion will not, we are convinced, turn in a Protectionist direction. The country laborers will not let the big loaf go; and neither they nor the town workmen will look at a new form of press-gang adapted to the less popular of the two war services. When the issue of the Lords is raised, as it ought to have been raised long ago, the simplicity and power of the argument for representative as against hereditary rule will be a new force for Liberalism and the Labor Party, while, if our leaders are wise, it will become the basis of a general understanding with the Irish as well as with the British democracy. Nor in the sphere of social reform do we see any opening for the genius of Toryism, or its pseudo-democratic wing. The British people will never stand a proposal like that of the Majority of the Royal Commission to commit the working of the Poor Law to selected coteries of the well-to-do, organised as branches of the Charity Organisation Society. The Liberal Party, therefore, should take courage. The evident promise of the future is with it, not against it.

Nor is this promise belied by the evidence of the bye-elections. Even during the last unfortunate months more electors voted Liberal and Labor than Tory. Through the whole Parliament, Scotland, which has suffered more than any part of the United Kingdom from the veto of the Lords, has been firm for the Government. Forfarshire is a typical constituency of the pure Scottish type. It once returned a Unionist; otherwise it has been Liberal, by a moderate surplus. In 1906, indeed, it shared the general fury of repudiation of Mr. Balfour's Government, but six years later, the present Lord Pentland was glad to retain his seat by a majority about one-tenth as large as that which Mr. Falconer obtained. The two electoral issues were the Land Bill and Free Trade, and on both the constituency stood firm. Nor is South Edinburgh unsatisfactory, if we clear our minds of the notion that 1906 was other than a "miraculous year" in electioneering. The constituency is uncertain, having been alternately Liberal and Tory, and the most recent additions to it come from the type of dwellers in villas. A good proportion of these middle-class men appear to be Tariff Reformers, and that in itself is regrettable enough. But a Liberal majority of 1,200, rarely attainable in normal years, shows that the mass of Scottish urban voters remains progressive and Free Trade, and that powerful reserves of conviction and feeling withstand a general Protectionist success at the polls. In Central Glasgow the result is no doubt markedly unfavorable. But in the first place Glasgow was never a Liberal seat; in the second place it is a mixed constituency, in the presence of which an Irish element provokes a counter-force of extreme resistance to Home Rule. It was this antagonism on which the Unionist managers relied to conceal the want of agreement on Protection, while the powerful organ of Scottish Free Trade Unionism used it to drive Free Traders of its persuasion to the poll in support of Mr. Scott-Dickson. Even this gentleman dared not advance much beyond the equivocations of a leader who conceals each advance to Protection by a cloud of formulæ compatible or half-compatible with Free Trade.

The surrender of the Free Trade Unionists was, however, qualified. It was, their organ was careful to explain, merely a betrayal ad hoc. It was so important to keep the Irish people from governing themselves that it was worth risking the chance of inflicting dear food on them and on their Scottish and English brethren. Therefore, said the "Glasgow Herald," Unionist Free Traders ought to prefer an "enlightened expediency" to "obstinate adherence to principle," and there could be no betrayal of Free Trade in voting for a Protectionist who would not make his principles "effective" in the present Parliament. By this high-minded reasoning the "Glasgow Herald" urged its readers to vote against a Free Trader with no chance whatever of making his Home Rule principles prevail in a Parliament in which both parties had expressly barred it out. It is not surprising that a party of such intellectual and moral fibre as this should be contemptuously told by the chief Unionist Whip to stand aside from the next election, and let people with some soul and purpose fight it out together.

The argument of the "Glasgow Herald" is, of course, worthless, for the Protectionists have not for a moment hesitated to credit their creed with the victory in Central Glasgow, and it is evident to everyone who studies the slippery methods of party warfare that the hopes of a Protectionist victory next election are built mainly on the belief that they can win at the polls by wearing down and discrediting a Free Trade Government, and can then snatch a victory for the tariff by "bluffing" Mr. Balfour into the belief that the spoils of victory were rightly theirs. The public do not look nicely at electoral results; they examine them in the broad mass, and as the noise and volume of the Protectionist propaganda drown every other voice in Toryism, they assume it to be the cause of the electoral successes of the Opposition. It is here that the political incapacity of the Free Trade Unionists stands revealed. Their first demand to the Liberal Party was to give up its Liberalism as a price of the Free Trade Unionist vote. When this was refused they retreated, with the "Spectator," into the remotest cave of Toryism, and in that archaic retreat they have remained ever since, vituperating democracy, and making occasional sallies into the open in the guise of Protectionist voters. The result is that they have ceased to be a practical force in politics. Save on the Licensing Bill, they objected to nothing that the Lords have done to discredit Liberalism and Free Trade, and many of them pressed for the rejection of Old Age Pensions and the Trades Disputes Act. They have not been a moderating influence as against extreme Toryism, even in the sense of Mr. Chamberlain's earlier career as a Liberal Unionist. Totally differing from the Peelites in moral firmness and intellectual consistency, they have not produced, since the death of the Duke of Devonshire, a single statesman of weight, with the possible exception of Lord Cromer. They have exhibited one or two sterling examples of personal honesty, and that is all. They profess no theory of government which either British party accepts, or on which it would be possible to govern a European State. Now that they have broken all ties with the Liberals, they cannot, in their turn, complain if we refuse, at their suggestion, to make any second reservation in regard to Home Rule. The pledge, if pledge it was, was unwisely given at the Election of 1906, and it is safe to say that, now that the timidity and anti-Liberalism of the Free Fooders' press and of the majority of their leaders have been fully revealed, it will never be renewed.

Life and Letters.

THE LATTER-DAY PROPHET.

"No one reads Ruskin now," said one of the leaders of artistic circles the other day, and very likely she was right. If she had shared the misfortune of being born thirty years earlier she would have lain at Ruskin's feet thirty years ago in a loose blue cloak and a shimmer of fluffy hair. But time has been kind in keeping her for a later day when she may find more beauty in a foggy mud-bank than in the Alps, and in a motor's steam than in all the stones of Italy. To be born late is an advantage that defies attack, and every year's revelation begins by quietly obliterating the last.

It is magnificent, this procession of continually advancing splendor, always reaching forward with unsatisfied longing for change, always dropping behind it what once was thought so dear, strowing its path with a litter of outworn affections. To be sure, there is something a little pathetic about it too, at all events to the affections thus outworn. And in this case there seems a peculiar pathos that the leader of artistic circles should have uttered her easy condemnation just on the very day when, after many years of faithful and ungrudging labor, the final volumes of the great Library Edition of Ruskin's works were ready to appear. They appeared last Thursday, and the noblest memorial that devotion and self-sacrifice have ever raised to a Master is now complete.

Mr. George Allen, Ruskin's disciple, friend, and publisher, who designed this great and final edition, is no longer here to rejoice in its fulfilment. But the editors, Mr. E. T. Cook and Mr. Alexander Wedderburn, can look back on having accomplished a work almost unequalled, we suppose, in the history of scholarship, whether we regard its difficulty, its labor, or its success. It is sometimes the way of genius to be greater than its work, and there was about Ruskin's personality a living soul whose influence went further than anything he wrote. But in these thirty-seven volumes is encased as in a shrine all that is tangible in the life-work of one of the strangest and most conspicuous men of genius that England has produced, and one of the most influential upon our national character, no matter how much the vogue of artistic circles may affect to disregard him now. Influence is an unconscious thing, and many who feel it most are not aware from whom it comes. But there are some left who upon the course of years littered with fading reputations can still approach this shrine in gratitude alike to the builders and to the noble spirit whom it commemorates.

The two last volumes contain a selection from Ruskin's letters—a selection running to several hundred, perhaps to a thousand or two, for Ruskin was copious in letter-writing as in everything he did. We only wish that two more volumes had been added so as to include the answers. Then we should have had a picture of nearly all last century's leading thought and art. As it is, though letters do not make a biography, being often only the expression of passing moods and usually written to please or to discuss some casual interest, still we can follow in them the career and, to some extent, the mind of a man who touched last century's life at some of its most vital points and profoundly affected them. We are first taken back to the well-to-do middle-class family of days when Queen Victoria was playing with her dolls—a typical family except for the father's strain of something like genius in critical appreciation. We see them all gathered on a suburban hill—pious and evangelical, reading the Bible persistently from end to end, but not excluding other literature of the best kind, liking Pope, and even admitting Byron with hesitation. We see them setting out upon their holidays in the family coach, with a joyous sense of change and adventure such as no motor ever equals. Compared to the mother, as Ruskin confessed, he and his father always appeared rather profane and rebellious characters, and in one of her letters, written to her son when he was fifty, there is a touch which unconsciously reveals the nicety and pious trustfulness of her nature.

> "I have had some experience of one of your large grasshoppers," she writes, "and have no desire to have anything more to do with such acquaintance. I dislike the insect tribe altogether, except as they excite my deep reverence towards the Life sustaining them."

From such breeding, which people under forty can no longer understand without a difficult effort of imagination—from such decent and profoundly solemn breeding, as always in the eye of a loving though overwhelming Power, Ruskin acquired the reverential mind that can find no subject for scorn or jest in beliefs, though knowledge has outworn them. What he said of himself in politics was true of him in higher things than those: "Bred a Tory," he writes, "and gradually developed into an indescribable thing, certainly not a Tory." Or again, "I am a Conservative by instinct, loving old things because they are old, and hating new things merely because they are new." It is this reverential love for the beauty of the past, this pious consideration for things that our fathers have told us, which distinguishes him among the great reforming spirits of his age. It is true the age was deeply touched by the same reverential honor for ancient nobleness. We have but to think of Newman in religion, of Carlyle in literature, or of the Pre-Raphaelites in art, to see how profound that feeling was among the finest minds. But in Ruskin it reached a passionate yearning that surpassed all the others in regret and in the sorrowful indignation that embittered his existence. For on all sides, in religion, in common life, and in art, he saw the remains of ancient beauty crumbling away together with the beliefs that gave them birth. When the present writer met him once in Savoy, Ruskin was continually lamenting that the snow was no longer so pure and deep on Mont Blanc as in his youth. It may have been true or not, but the profound regret with which he said it was caused by the disappearance of many other things more important for man's spirit than the snow upon Mont Blanc.

This reverential melancholy marked him early. Some years before he was thirty he wrote to his father from Pisa:—

> "I do believe that I shall live to see the ruin of everything good and great in the world, and have nothing left to hope for but the fires of the judgment to shrivel up the cursed idiocy of mankind."

But more effectual, though not less tormenting, than these haunting regrets for the beauty of vanished time was the spirit continually questioning why the present was thus growing in hideousness. That questioning spirit was part of the man's peculiar accuracy and depth of vision. There was nothing he did not see. Till he spoke, he appeared to be all eyes. Behind everything visible he saw something else again, and then something else, just as in opposite looking-glasses the reflections go to infinity. In the commonest things it was always the same. Going to one of his Oxford lectures, he saw a little girl wearing her mother's old boots. "Why does a little girl wear her mother's old boots?" he kept asking, and the question led him through all modern society to the limits of the universe. Or again, in walking among mountains, which he loved perhaps more passionately than any form of beauty, he would suddenly ask, "Why is ground at an angle of 40 anything better than ground at an angle of 30—or of 20—or of 10—or of nothing at all?" And so the question would take him back and back by subtle analysis to the ultimate problems of life.

It was the same in literature; and that is why, in spite of his extraordinary admiration of "Aurora Leigh" in these letters, he was one of the keenest and most enlightening critics of a great age in criticism. But, above all, it was upon the new social conditions of the time that this questioning spirit was turned. In a truthful analysis of his own nature which he sent to Henry Acland, when he was nearly forty, he writes:—

> "I am forced by precisely the same instinct to the consideration of political questions that urges me to examine the laws of architectural or mountain forms. I cannot help doing so; the questions suggest themselves to me, and I am compelled to work them out. I cannot rest till I have got them clear."

And it is in this sphere that his spirit of unresting question has had its widest influence. Perhaps we see the first definite beginning of that influence when he gave evidence in 1860 before a Parliamentary Committee on Public Institutions. He thus describes the scene:—

> "You would have been amused at seeing some of their faces as I got out, in repeated and clear answers, my hatred of Competition. At last, on my saying finally that all distress mainly came from adopting for a principle the struggle of man with man, instead of the help of 'man by man,' Sir Robert Peel burst out with: 'Most extraordinary sentiments, I must say, Mr. Ruskin.'"

As before, it needs a strong effort of imagination to call up the age when all Ruskin's sentiments, on economics as on art, appeared most extraordinary to the leaders of thought and to all educated and commercial people. Such sentiments as that the workman is of more value than the work, and that art is worthless as long as life is hideous, have now become the common currency of thought, and few remember the startled indignation with which they first were greeted. Still, it is not so very long ago—not thirty years—since the commonest criticism on Ruskin was that he was perfectly right as long as he stuck to art and left economics alone, and it is strange to think how exactly that criticism has now been reversed.

Dr. John Brown once called Ruskin "a stray angel who has singed his wings a little and tumbled into our sphere. He has all the arrogance, insight, unreasonableness, and spiritual sheen of a celestial." It is a true description, for in all his life one is conscious of a violent and pathetic disharmony between himself and the world around him. He was conscious of it himself, and it was the cause of the melancholy that pervaded his highest joy and his tenderest humor. "This working in a way contrary to one's whole nature," he wrote to the Brownings, "tells upon one at last:—

> "For my own pleasure I should be collecting stones and mosses, drying and ticketing them—reading scientific books—walking all day long in summer—going to plays, and what not, in winter—never writing nor saying a word—rejoicing tranquilly or intensely in pictures, in music, in pleasant faces, in kind friends."

His glory was that, surrounded by the evil of this present world, he could not accept that angelic life. Singularly conscious of past beauty, he could not let the past blind him to the hideousness in which it had issued, nor could the passion of his indignation allow him to rest in those calm and exquisite havens where he would be.

THE PARALYSIS OF SATIRE.

The death of Caran d'Ache may, among other and sadder effects, draw attention to the state of caricature in this country as compared with France and the rest of Christendom. Caran d'Ache called himself impersonally "The Pencil"; and, indeed, his mere pencil, his mere manual trick, was of some international and symbolic importance. His style of drawing expressed the central French paradox, the combination of extravagance with lucidity. His habit of running a clear and complete line round all his funny little figures was not artistic, in the sense that the brilliant omissions of Phil May were artistic, or the rainy twilights of Keene, or the thousand varied strokes of a thousand French caricaturists. But it was intellectual; it was a sort of logical definition of all the men, animals, and trees that he drew. His figures resembled dancing diagrams. It was as if some mad philosopher had cut all creation out of cardboard. Nor is it surprising that Caran d'Ache occupied his later years in making wooden figures of kings and statesmen; his whole joy was in such absurd simplification of the human form.

But Caran d'Ache alone does not give quite an adequate outlook on the state of this satiric style of art. And the state of it in this country is very weak indeed, and wants looking to. This weakness does not arise from that alleged inferiority of England in the fine arts of which the Philistine boasts, and with which the æsthete flatters the Philistine. A mere inferiority in art criticism would be comparatively unimportant; and it is exactly because it is unimportant that we are always hearing about it. The real evil is one which is much deeper. It is not in art that we are inferior to the French just now. At this particular period we are inferior to the French in politics—and in morals.

The difference between French and English caricature does not lie in the fact that caricature in England is inferior. It lies in the fact that caricature in England is not caricature. As pictorial art some of it is very good, perhaps better than the French. There are several artists now on "Punch" whose treatment of atmospheres or interiors, spluttering sunlight or tender twilights, are really among the victories of pen and ink. But it is all very warm sunlight and twilight, very tender indeed; there is not one solitary flash of the true lightning of satire. Indeed, as one looks at these dim indoor pictures in "Punch," a curious cold fear grips the heart of any patriotic man, a fear that perhaps they may depict only too well, in that cheerless afternoon closing in upon cushioned furniture and courteous tired conversation, our dim aristocratic decline. England is a slowly darkening drawing-room. The men of the drawing-room are still athletic, but they are not fighting; the women, whom one traces dimly, are still beautiful, but men do not take any risks to win them. That drawing-room which Du Maurier filled with light and laughter, with freaks and prejudices, superficial, indeed, but alive, is growing greyer and greyer hour by hour; and only a few figures linger sulkily in the corners. This will not do; we must have some caricature, coarse, cruel, shameless—and moral.

The essential qualities of true caricature are capable of some rough summary. First (if it is to be hearty and heroic caricature) it must be attacking something powerful. If it is attacking something powerful, then almost all brutalities of method are excusable, because they are redressing a balance. If a man sets up to be more than human, you may remind him that he is human, even if you remind him that he was seasick. It is infamous to point at a deformed pedlar as a humpback, because you are laying another burden on a back already bowed. But it is not infamous to point at Richard III. at his coronation as a humpback, because his physical infirmity is analagous to those moral infirmities which make such despotism a danger. That a king may easily be a weakling is not an attack on weaklings, but an attack on kings. It is bad taste to call a harmless old applewoman fat; but it is not bad taste to call George IV. fat, because a whole false picture of politics and life is founded on the idea that he is dignified, elegant, and alert. Thus it is also even with the outrageous caricatures of Gillray and others against Napoleon—the pictures which represented Napoleon as a monkey, a pigmy, a mere microbe to be looked at through a microscope. They were spiteful, they were frantic, they were false, but they were great caricatures; they had the soul of satire, because they sought to put down the mighty from his seat. These men drew Napoleon small because they knew that he was great. They sought to make him smart with pictures of defeat, because they had themselves smarted at the sight of his victories.

Look at these Gillray pictures, with some disgust, perhaps, at their thirsty and pitiless malignity against a great enemy. Then open the current number of "Punch"; and see how far we have fallen from that comprehensible cruelty, that high and human revenge. One of the cartoons of "Punch" this week has for its point the alleged fact that some people in Ireland receive old age pensions before the Parliamentary date. It is illustrated by a picture of ragged Irish peasants, drawn so as to bear just that decent resemblance to apes which "Punch" demands, dancing with delight because all of them, old and young, have received an old age pension. These are the things our cartoonists attack; and that is why they cannot produce any great caricature. They are attacking the shifts and tricks of the poor; because they dare not attack those of the powerful. The French Anti-Clericals can draw real caricatures of swollen Cardinals riding on donkeys; because the Catholic Church is a powerful thing. The French Nationalists can draw real caricatures of fat Jews tipped out of motor cars; because Jewish cosmopolitan finance is a powerful thing. One can be really angry with such things. But no one can be really angry because some people, admittedly very poor, have by accident or ignorance or small pretences, obtained a little comfort before they die. The thing may be a matter for official rectification or official rebuke; but it is not a matter for satire. Considered as satire the thing is a cowardly subterfuge; compared with this kind of thing Gillray was a gentleman. "Punch" will never again be a great organ of public criticism until it begins again to hit the things that can hit it back, of which it can take an ample choice, the Royal Family, the Jewish bankers, the Party system, the Police, the Middle-class Conscience—or even the Christian Religion. It can select whichever it likes to attack, but I should say the safest is the last. But to confine oneself to attacking occasional anarchist organ-grinders or Irish peasants so remote that the artist has obviously never seen them—that is to disappear from the world of creative caricature.

The second principle which is essential to caricature is that it should appeal to a plain moral standard. Satire has grown weak precisely because belief has grown weak. Our caricatures have grown tame in proportion as our speculations have grown wild. And this is evident and rational. How can I effectively hold up to ridicule some vice which a cleverer man may be holding up to adoration? How can I caricature some dirty philosopher who is always ready to caricature himself? This is the second great reason why we cannot draw such caricatures as we drew in the eighteenth century against George IV. or Napoleon. If we denounced the infidelities of George, we should find that half the "advanced" people were praising infidelity. If we reproached Napoleon with his bloody laurels, we should find that bloody laurels were quite correct wear in the opinion of every clerk who had read Nietzsche. Satire involves revolt; but revolt involves a fixed ideal. It is only those who are in possession who can afford to be sceptics. And they generally have been sceptics. People talk, for instance, of Mr. Balfour as an exception; but nearly all Tory leaders have been like Mr. Balfour. Behind Balfour one sees the sneering Salisbury, behind him the sneering Disraeli, and so by almost unbroken succession back to all the Kings that have felt themselves free from God. It is only the rebel who needs to be a dogmatist. The ruler has always had the wisdom to see that his strongest asset was the open mind. Age after age the same divine humanity has stood bound in the same hall of judgment. But the judge in his high chair of judgment has seldom been so silly as merely to say to the prisoner "You lie." He has always said, "What is truth?" One can see Mr. Balfour leaning forward and saying it.

G. K. C.

THE LOGICIAN IN PARLIAMENT.

The characteristic English attitude towards close reasoning in affairs is one of mingled admiration and suspicion. Part of the traditional mistrust of lawyers belongs to this attitude, for it is a function of their profession to apply tight rules of logical consistency to the loose conduct of life. The philosopher and the professional moralist are regarded with a similar reserve: we admit the reason and justice of their arguments, we respect their conclusions; but when we are invited to apply them, we begin to make excuses and demand "allowances." But it is in politics that the humor and the wisdom of the proceeding are most evident.

A logician in Parliament has always been regarded primarily as an intellectual entertainer. His endeavors to apply fixed principles to the streaky, obdurate material of actual politics are apt to arouse in the "practical politician" a keener sense of the irony of life. But our intellectual entertainer must understand his rôle: logic and erudition must be insinuated, not inflicted. The too academic reasoner is soon relegated to the limbo of bores, as several eminent examples among the living and the dead serve to indicate. The very title "Professor" is detrimental in the House of Commons. But the "entertainment" need not be light. J. S. Mill, Charles Bradlaugh, and Mr. Leonard Courtney were listened to with interest and satisfaction, because the House admires men of principles arguing unpopular causes, either with grey logic or the white heat of passionate conviction. There is, in fact, a sort of tacit conspiracy by which in every House the logic and conscience which the ordinary members cannot afford to keep, are delegated to one or two independent personalities. Such men in the late Parliament were Lord Hugh Cecil and Mr. Gibson Bowles.

In this Parliament the most conspicuous example is Mr. Harold Cox. It is an evident advantage, though by no means indispensable, that the representative of naked reason should sit on the side of the majority, for this position gives a dramatic background to his insurrectionary criticism. Mr. Cox is the ghost of mid-Victorian philosophic Radicalism appearing to reproach twentieth century Liberalism with not having given decent burial to its predecessor. His particular part is to expose to the light of day the halting, groping, bleareyed, compromising Socialism, which by process of what is called "the inevitable," is rapidly displacing the old interpretation of individual liberty as the leading principle of public conduct. Though few can share his desire to resurrect laissez faire, or regard it as a possibility, many honest Liberals in the House and the country admire and approve the sharp sword-play with which he pierces the complacent padding of opportunism which, alike in social legislation, in foreign policy, in defence and in finance, usurps the title of "reform." Many of them experience a painful perplexity when they are called upon to prove a modicum of consistency, and they would like a stiffening of, say, 10 per cent. of reason in the blend of self-interest, tradition, sport, and public spirit, which constitutes their politics. No doubt what is lacking is not merely logic; it is also clear ideals, and the force to realise them. But the havoc which a critic using a logical method can appear to make with many of the constructive proposals of their party policy causes them dismay. As a provoker of internal disquietude, Mr. Cox performs a very useful work, and it is right that his dialectics should receive the full attention they deserve. For in an age when compact reasoning, as well as sentiment, is in danger of disappearing from public life in favor of "business methods," we should cherish our logicians even though they chastise us.

But though we hear their censure, we should reserve our judgment. It is hardly ever wise to follow closely a logician in practical affairs. Though few sayings arouse more scorn among persons of "superior intellect" than "true in theory false in practice," this vulgar antithesis contains a profound element of truth. It is an excellent thing to have a Mr. Harold Cox to challenge the adopted policy of his party by the Socratic method of a search for definitions, proceeding along the sharp edge of extreme cases, and branching out into tapering dilemmas and witty arguments per impossibile. Indeed, we may almost say that if Mr. Cox did not exist, it would be necessary to invent him. For where a Government commits itself to novel projects of Unemployment Relief, Free Feeding of School Children, Old Age Pensions, and the like, there is a proper function for the spirit that denies, the sceptic who asks whether any public expenditure for unemployment can increase the total volume of employment, whether free feeding will not destroy "the family," or pensions usher in an era of corruption and enervation. The rationalist does good service in applying his critical tests, but the politician can never admit their absolute validity. This is why the logician always ranks as jester in politics: for it remains the most perennial deep-seated jest to pretend that man is a purely rational animal, and that conduct can be ruled by logic. "But surely," it may be said, "it is right to acknowledge the supremacy of pure reasoning, and to make politics as exact a science as is possible." Such, for instance, is the plea of Mr. Graham Wallas, who, while fully acknowledging the actual strength, and even the dominance of sentiment, interest, usage, and inertia, regards all progress in political method as consisting in the logical application of quantitative analysis.

At the peril of appearing obscurantist and reactionary, we may, however, enter a protest against the underlying assertion or assumption that politics ought to aim at becoming an exact science. For abstraction, or in other words the ignoring of the concrete and particular, is of the essence of science, and not all the finest classification and specialisation of treatment will enable the scientific statesman or his official to "tackle" the uniqueness of any individual case.

The real significance of the practical man's recalcitrance against the theorist, his suspicion of logic, his distrust of statistics, lies in his recognition that politics is not only a science, but an art. It is true that in the hands of the ordinary politician it is so crude an art as to be little better than a "dodge." But in this underlying truth there exists a certain rationale for the hand-to-mouth policy of illogical compromise scornfully described as "muddling through." The logical purist will be too insistent in his interpretation of equity or utility: he will press too strongly for the realisation of a too abstractly conceived ideal, will require too close a consistency in means and methods. The artist or statesman will recognise that the incongruity of the sentiments which constitute political "power" and the blurred images alike of the "desired" and the "desirable," the knowledge that history never does repeat itself, that every situation or grouping of events is unique—all demand motives and methods which can have no sanction from logic or science. An Art, handling refractory material, with imperfectly known powers, for a dimly realised ideal, demands courage, faith, and imagination, which no science of politics can supply, accurately test, or justify. The "logician" insists that a policy which contains some inconsistency, involves some risk, or even inflicts some injustice, should be discarded. But the practical statesman knows that risk-taking is all in his day's work, that every Act of Parliament must contain some inconsistencies, and every fresh Budget inflict injustice upon many individuals. It is, no doubt, his business to keep these risks and damages within the narrowest dimensions consistent with the achievement of his general purpose. But even in pursuing this economy, trained instinct plays a more important part than scientific calculation, and the logic of his method is that of the workshop rather than of the schoolroom. The moral of all this is that we must use our parliamentary detractors for what they are worth, putting into politics as much logic as it will hold, and no more.

THE WIND FLOWERS.

All the morning the snow has been sifting down, till the greenest of the grass is in aspic, and only the long grey blades give color to the fields. Snow-scuds have obliterated the other side of our narrow valley, and the black shadow of discharging clouds has deepened the wintryness of the picture. But now, as though by magic, the clouds have drawn away and are skirmishing on the distant hills; the snow-scuds have ceased, the sky is veined with blue, and the sun, breaking through, turns our dim valley actually into a vision of rosy loveliness. The snow is still there; and the black trees show white skeletons. But the eye is caught before it reaches the grey of the under world by the blossom-crowned elms. We have seen the maze of twigs thickening as the tips swelled for many weeks past, but not till to-day have the madder-pink blossoms responded as they do now to this sudden gleam of sunshine.

The elm blossom is seldom seen at close quarters, and by thousands upon thousands of us not at all. The rosy clouds of the elm tops in March are certain to charm those who look at them, but few are willing to give the tiny multitude the name of blossom. Only when the woodman has thrown one of the great shoots of the hedgerow in spring are we countrymen forced to see that here are clusters of pollen producers as worthy of notice as the great red tails that fall from the poplar. In London the diligent wood pigeons throw down the elm bloom in bunches, so that the saunterers by Rotten Row wonder what manner of tree it can be they are walking under.

"The murmur of innumerable bees in immemorial elms" is not the legitimate murmur of honey gatherers and pollen carriers. If it is heard at all (and the poet may be wrong) it comes in summer long after the blossoms have blown and withered, and the bees are attracted by the ooze of the well-detested honey-dew from the bodies of aphides. The incalculable amount of pollen that is being produced now is all for wind distribution. It must be produced by the pound for each stigma that is to be fertilised. The whole atmosphere must be filled with it, so that a tree in each parish may get its share. And, even then, to what end, so far as our elms are concerned? All these acres of rosy bloom, pollen grains more numerous than the snow that has fallen in a week, a million eager stigmas touched—and never a seed that will sprout. For the exotic elm that has in a few hundred years spread throughout the land by means of suckers is doomed in our country to perpetual sterility. Marvellous that it should bloom year by year with undiminished assiduity!

It is, of course, the season of wind flowers. Who would have the catkins fling out their pollen when the world is full of sticky new leaves and all manner of summer distractions to the messengers of love? Even with the world in bare branches, the chance seems less than infinitesimal that the hazel which some bird has planted on the edge of the quarry, among the beeches, should be fertilised by any but its own pollen. But many bushes within half a mile have now, not for the first time this winter, hung out their catkins at full length. The pollen has fallen out of each capsule on to the back of the next one below it, and it needs the smallest shake to set the cloud flying. It rises on the air like smoke. Like smoke or steam, we see it only for a moment while the separately invisible particles are crowded together, and then it vanishes as though it had never been. Just below us a whole coppice smokes as the wind comes and shakes every tree at once. All that dust, too, vanishes before we can count ten, but each of those million million grains of pollen is sailing its own safe barque on the rising air-current. They distribute themselves through the air more rapidly and doubtless just as evenly as a drop of dye might spread through the lake. The atmosphere of our valley is pollen. Each cubic yard of it at any rate, is capable of fertilising one of those tiny red stigmas that the hazel above the quarry has put out to catch nuts with.

Wherever we look we can find catkins full of powder, either now or very soon. The brook is one continuous line of alders, and now along their whole length a yellow glow of new catkins gleams through the black old cones that have been their feature through winter. Shake the yew or the box on a sunny morning, and you will be rewarded with just the same puffs of smoke that came from the nut branch. Soon the ash, the oak, and many other trees of the roadside or the garden will be puffing as vigorously, though the first primrose will distract our notice, and we shall not see them. But every one will discover when the larches take up the firing. The air will be heavy with the scented particles, and the glowing red tips of the sweeping lower branches will get attention at the expense of every flower of the field.

The larch captures us by the most material of the æsthetic senses, the nose, the vestibule of the stomach. There is no spring delight keener than the scent of the larch when it is in bloom. We have declared the presence of the larch and other conifers to be health-giving, only, it seems, because we can smell the good that they are doing us. Possibly they are good because they make us sniff our lungs full occasionally. Perhaps the actual particles, whatever they may be at other times, and especially the pollen grains in spring, do us some good, may even feed us through the mucous membrane. There is no food quite like pollen. So the bee finds, which on pollen does the greatest work of its size of any creature living, and so we believe the chemist finds when he analyses this richly nitrogenous substance. It may be because in spring the whole atmosphere of the world is full of assimilable nitrogen from the stamens of the wind flowers that a more learned generation than ours ordained the Lenten fast.

The snow has scarcely checked the ardour of the sallows and the willows which are pushing on towards the golden glory that brings them into vogue for Palm Sunday. The poplars, too, are heavy, almost as though with fruit, their great velvety red catkins almost ready to hang for a few days, and then fall in hundredweights from the high branches. Best of them all, the abele catches the sunlight on its silver trunk as though on mirrors and the thick fingers have woven a canopy overhead that glows in certain lights almost as warmly as the elms. To them the message of the wind is of more vital importance than to the other trees, most of which produce both stigmas and catkins, for these have all the stamens on one tree and all the stigmas on another. The nearest female abele is nearly a mile away, and if it does not get pollen from the ornament of our low meadow, the stigmas must go unfertilised or take dust from some eugenically inferior black or grey poplar. No one who lives in a poplar country can fail to note that there is some hybridism between these trees, and even the book naturalists are doubtful as to how many species to write down.

The sad Lombardy poplar is a widower here, and, as far as we can find, throughout the British Isles. Never have we seen a female tree, or the woolly fruit, which falls freely in autumn from the other poplars, decorating the branches of this species. But our tall tree, descendant by sucker in the tenth or twelfth remove from the first tree brought from Persia or thereabouts, annually flings out its catkins, the pollen of which can never come home. We see no signs of its blood in the small aspens or poplars, black, white, or grey that occasionally appear in the ditches. Still, if all its pollen is to be written down as wasted, so must 99·9 per cent. of the other organic dust that makes the spring air so aromatic, and gives unwonted color to the sunsets.

Present-Day Problems.

THE REVISION OF THE PRAYER-BOOK.

Probably the first effect of studying the Report of the Convocational Committee on Prayer-Book Revision will be to confirm the judgment of those who regretted the issue of the Letters of Business. It is, indeed, evident that great labor has been bestowed on the work, and that results have been reached which, if disappointing in extent, are not inconsiderable, and would, if sanctioned by law, improve the Prayer-Book in several directions. So much, perhaps, every candid man would admit, but he would certainly be justified if he proceeded to argue that some substantial defects of the Liturgy are left without change, and that so meagre a reformation would hardly be worth having if, as might well be the case, it destroyed the chance of a more thorough revision in the future.

It must be borne in mind that the Prayer-Book, being intended for general use, cannot safely be, in any marked degree, inconsistent with the general beliefs and customs of the congregations. These, however, are notably out of harmony with the desires of the educated minority, with whom, notwithstanding, unless experience be altogether a false guide, the future lies. Two illustrations will make the point sufficiently clear. Any satisfactory revision would have to deal drastically with the Scriptural quotations and allusions which are plentifully scattered through the Prayer-Book. These, of course, presuppose a view of the Bible which is extinct in educated circles, though probably as popular as ever among the mass of Church-goers. It would be absolutely impossible to carry a proposal to revise the Prayer-Book on the principles of moderate Biblical criticism, yet hardly anything is more necessary. The Convocational Committee has acquiesced in the impossibility, and limits its proposals to the excision of the "Three Witnesses Text," the substitution of the vague word "utterance" for the specific phrase "divers languages" in the Whit Sunday Special Preface, and the better rendering of a Pauline phrase in the Burial Office. The Marriage Service retains its archaic allusions to Adam and Eve, Isaac and Rebecca, Abraham and Sarah, as types of connubial excellence, and the Baptismal Service still makes mystical allusions to the legend of the Flood, and symbolises after the approved Patristic fashion. The other example is in some respects even more suggestive. Sacerdotalist extravagances were the original cause of the appointment of the Royal Commission, to which we owe the present attempt at Prayer-Book Revision. It might then go without saying that the most obviously necessary changes in the Prayer-Book, from the point of view of the nation, are those which would cleanse it of the features which experience has shown to be the occasions and apologies of sacerdotalist teaching and practice. There are two of these—the formula of Ordination to the Priesthood and the formula of Absolution in the Visitation of the Sick. Neither is defensible on Anglican principles, for neither can be justified by that primitive practice to which the Church of England professes to defer. Both are medieval introductions into the formularies, and manifestly connected with those crudely materialistic theories of the ministry and the Sacraments which governed medieval thought. Yet the Convocational Committee has retained both. A slight concession to Evangelical sentiment, indeed, is made in the Visitation of the Sick by adding to the objectionable indicative absolution an alternative precatory form borrowed from the Order of Holy Communion; and that is all. The citadel of sacerdotalism, which is also liturgically the least defensible feature of the Prayer-Book, remains secure, and the continuance of sacerdotal aggression is thereby made certain. Regrettable as this is, it cannot be denied that in the present state of clerical feeling no other course was possible. Even if the Committee itself could have agreed to make the requisite changes (a supposition which, in view of the actual composition of the Committee, appears almost grotesque) it is unthinkable that Convocation would have endorsed the proposal, or the High Church party acquiesced in it. From the standpoint of national Christianity nothing can be more important than the removal of unnecessary obstacles to frank religious intercourse with non-episcopalians. Of these admittedly the exclusive theory of the Ministry, commonly associated with the dogma of Apostolic Succession, is the most formidable. That exclusive theory bases itself on the Preface to the Ordinal, which, having been composed at a time when accurate knowledge of primitive Christianity was not attainable, states in a crude and absolute way a view of the Threefold Ministry which the modern scholar can only accept with many and important modifications. Nevertheless, the Preface remains unaltered, to form in the future, as in the past, a basis for clerical claims which are as irrational as they are offensive. A slender concession to the principle of Christian fraternity is made in an addition to the rubric at the end of the Confirmation Service, which now permits the unconfirmed, with the Ordinary's "approval" and the minister's "permission," to receive the Holy Communion. This is the only mitigation of Anglican exclusiveness which the Report contains.

The proposal to make optional the use of the Athanasian Creed is open to effective criticism, but it can be defended on practical grounds, and probably offers the easiest solution of a problem which has too long disturbed the Church. Few indications of the rapid extension of Tractarian opinions among the clergy are more suggestive than the tenacity with which a powerful section of clergy and clericalist laymen now hold to a rubric which, by compelling the recitation of an admittedly objectionable formula, drives the liberal-minded clergy to the miserable choice of wounding their own consciences or of breaking the law.

Two proposals will probably provoke more controversy than all the rest of the Report. These are the sanctioning of the "Vestments" and the permitting "Reservation" of the consecrated elements for the use of the sick. The resolution respecting the Vestments is open to many objections. The statements on which the proposal is based are highly contentious, and the proposal itself cannot fail to provoke vehement opposition. It is true that the Committee has drafted a prefatory rubric designed to prevent arbitrary changes "in the customary arrangement and conduct of Divine Service," and the proposal to sanction the use of the Vestments must be read in connection with that rubric. Still, no one who has followed the history of Vestments in the Church of England can doubt that their introduction into the parish churches is the most conspicuous symbol of medieval teaching, and the most significant breach with the consistent practice of the Reformed Church. The learned archæological pamphlet in which a committee of five bishops has maintained the non-significance of "Vestments" argues either little candor or little intelligence. Religious men of even the narrowest opinions do not contend for things which mean nothing; it is only because they mean something which to their minds is of great importance that they fight for them. In this case the Tractarian clergy have made no secret of the reasons why they set so high a value on the Vestments; they have quite frankly stated their desire to go back on the Reformation and restore the continuity of sacramental doctrine. Their spokesmen before the Commission, notably the Bishop of Birmingham and the Archbishop of York, then Bishop of Stepney, stated quite clearly that the concession of "the six points" was a sine quâ non. In view of this state of opinion, any concession by authority could only be interpreted as a striking victory for Anglican sacerdotalism. The carefully elaborated conditions under which the Vestments may be introduced will be unheeded; the concession of the main point will monopolise attention, and, since there is no prospect of parliamentary legislation, the authority of Convocation will be held to suffice for any clergyman who desires to give a color of public sanction to his introduction of vestments. Much the same objections lie against the permission of Reservation for the sick. The Committee has, indeed, drafted rubrics designed to prevent the abuse of this permission by making it the occasion of those "devotions" which are so prominent a feature of the Roman Church; but can any sane man suppose that these rubrics can be effectual? Given the sacramental belief which underlies the demand for any reservation of the consecrated elements, is it charitable to prohibit those acts of reverence which give it natural expression? Once concede the main point, how can you effectively resist its logical consequences?

The minor changes in the rubrics recommended by the Committee have been mostly designed to meet practical needs discovered in the experience of parish clergy. They are almost without exception excellent.

H. Hensley Henson.

The Drama.

THE MORE OR LESS REAL WOMAN.

Mr. Hichens must try again. "The Real Woman" is not so much a bad play as a good play gone wrong. It seems as though it had met with an accident and been "telescoped"; for it has a beginning and an end, but no middle. We have the preliminaries of a drama and the solution of a drama; but we look in vain for the drama itself. Mr. Hichens has underestimated the effort it costs to make a good play, and has skipped the crucial point of his action. It is as though we saw an athlete make great preparations for vaulting a high bar, and then calmly duck his head and walk under it.

The framework of the play is not new, but acceptable enough. Mark Vernon, a gentleman who owns six newspapers, but has not yet got his peerage, is a candid and simple soul, resolutely on the side of the angels. Let not the reader rebel against this initial improbability: in the first place, the play is a romance; in the second place, Mr. Vernon's newspapers have nothing to do with the matter—he might just as well be an ornament of one of the characteristically virtuous professions, such as engineering. At all events, he is in love with a beautiful widow, Lady Arden, who numbers among her other suitors a villain named Horace Carruthers. At a supper party one evening, the talk falls on a certain Hugh Graham, an aristocratic idealist, who has devoted his life to work among the poor in Poplar, and is supposed to be something of a woman-hater. Vernon is his friend, and speaks highly of him; Carruthers, on the other hand, ridicules his saintly pretensions, and offers to bet Vernon two to one that if he can be brought within Lady Arden's sphere of influence she will wean him from all his ideals, and make him return to Mayfair and cynicism. Vernon at first declines to make any such bet, but Lady Arden herself dares him to accept Carruthers's challenge, and he cannot resist her. To them enter Hugh Graham, in search of Vernon. A little cripple to whom Vernon has been kind, and who consequently worships him, has been run over by an omnibus, and begs that he may see his wonderful benefactor before he dies. Here, then, is Lady Arden's opportunity; she flings a light wrap over her evening dress, strips the supper-table of its champagne, its jellies, and its flowers, bundles them into a basket, and, in spite of Vernon's protests and Hugh Graham's chill indifference, insists on coming with them in the motor to Poplar, on pretext of nursing the sick child. Regarded from the point of view of sober probability, all this—in short, it had better not be regarded from the point of view of sober probability. But it is a quite good starting-point for a romance, in which, moreover, there is ample room for serious character-study and conflict of emotion. The idea of such a wager is so far from being new that it may be traced back to one of the most ancient of dramas—the Book of Job. In more recent days it has done duty more than once, though I cannot recall the name of the play of which "The Real Woman" most closely reminds me. But that matters very little. A dramatist is at perfect liberty to use a conventional gambit, if only he shows originality and power in the further conduct of the game.

This opening, however, has one serious disadvantage: namely, that it is almost impossible to get away from one clearly foreseen line of development. What we naturally expect is that the insincere person—the person who is merely trying to win a wager—shall succeed in captivating or dominating the sincere person, but shall, in the process, warm up into sincerity, and shall be punished by the indignation and contempt of the sincere person when he or she finds that he or she has been the victim of a tasteless jest. I say "he or she" because, although the victim happens in this case to be a man, that is not in the least necessary. In the other play which haunts my memory, but refuses to give up its name, I fancy it was a young girl who was the subject of the wager. Be this as it may, Mr. Hichens makes no attempt to switch his action on to unforeseen lines. Things duly take their predestined course; and in this, again, there would be no real harm if only the individual characters involved were highly vitalised, and their processes of emotion subtly and convincingly portrayed. But it is just here that Mr. Hichens fails. For one thing, he has not given himself space enough for the development of his theme. It cannot possibly be worked out in three short acts, whereof one is necessarily a mere prologue. Unity of time is all very well, but such a drama as this cannot possibly be compressed into an hour and three-quarters of real, and something like eighteen hours of imaginary, time.

The second act opens by no means ill. The scene is a bedroom in Kelly Street, Poplar—the room of Diana Woodham, a tailoress or something of the sort, the sister of the boy who has been run over. Diana is out at a party, and Hugh Graham has tried in vain to have her informed of the accident. In this room, then, Graham, Vernon, and Lady Arden appear. Vernon goes to sit with the child in an adjoining room, and Lady Arden is much chagrined because Graham will not allow her to go too. Graham does not conceal his belief that her sudden desire to play the Lady Bountiful is a mere frivolous caprice; and there is a very good scene between them, in which, while Graham is busy with measures for relieving the child's suffering, Lady Arden's efforts to help him prove quite unavailing, and the insincerity, or at any rate the superficiality, of her compassion is clearly proved. Graham's contemptuous politeness in this scene is very effective. One feels that it must be extremely galling to the spoilt beauty, and must make her doubly eager to bring this farouche young Hippolytus to her feet. It is what a German theorist would probably call the intensifying moment of the drama—the point at which Lady Arden's relation to Graham is transformed from a matter of idle sport to one in which her self-love, and even the deeper fibres of her nature, are intimately concerned.

So far, good: but this scene is no sooner over than the play begins definitely to go off the rails. Lady Arden being left alone for a moment, to her enters the seamstress, Diana Woodham, whom we have heard parting from a merry company of friends outside. She is naturally astonished to find her bedroom tenanted by a lady in gorgeous evening dress; and an utterly incredible scene ensues. Any reasonable woman, in Lady Arden's place, would explain her presence, briefly and simply, and would break to the girl, as gently as possible, the fact of the accident to her brother. Not so Lady Arden. She says nothing at all about the child, gives no coherent explanation of her presence, and soon gets at hopeless cross-purposes with Diana, who imagines that she has been brought or sent there by the villain, Carruthers. I have hitherto omitted to mention—for it is a portion of the plot as inessential as it is conventional and foolish—that Diana has been seduced and abandoned by Carruthers, and rescued by Hugh Graham. Lady Arden does not know this, but Diana assumes that she does; and the result, I repeat, is a series of improbable and meaningless "cross questions and crooked answers." At last one of the men enters, and tells Diana what has happened to her brother; and then, and not till then, Lady Arden begins to behave in a womanly and sympathetic way to the little seamstress. It is very little she does, and there is no evidence in it of anything more than the most ordinary kindness which any decent woman would show to another under the circumstances. But it suffices for Hugh Graham. His scepticism as to Lady Arden's character and motives vanishes like a ghost at cock-crow. He permits her ladyship to go to the bedside of the dying boy, and we see beyond a doubt that Carruthers's wager is virtually won—that the idealist is completely bowled over.

And yet, though the guileless newspaper-proprietor admits the villain's victory, he has not really, logically, and properly won. It is true that in the third act—eighteen hours after their first meeting—Hugh Graham proposes to Lady Arden. But what of that? The wager was that she would make him renounce his ideals, abandon Poplar to its fate, and revert to the hedonist philosophy of his caste; whereas in fact he shows no disposition to do anything of the kind. On the contrary, his proposal is that Lady Arden shall desert Mayfair for Poplar, and become a ministering angel of the slums. I do not see in this any victory for Carruthers: but it is not worth while to discuss the matter, for the play has gone hopelessly to pieces with Graham's sudden revulsion from frigid scepticism to fervid adoration. The drama is simply omitted. It should, of course, have consisted of the gradual and artful conquest of the saint by the worldly enchantress, of his struggles against the fascination, and, conversely, of her gradual discovery that the jest was like to be a costly one to her own peace of mind. This should have been the matter of full two acts; whereas the actual process which converts chill hostility into worship takes something like two minutes. It is possible (though I can scarcely conceive it) that Mr. Hichens designed to represent a sudden sensual madness on Hugh Graham's part—an abject surrender to the sheer physical attraction of the enchantress, which he disguises to his own conscience by pretending to believe in her divine gift of sympathy and loving kindness. If this was indeed Mr. Hichens' intention, he has carried it out extremely ill: he ought to have given us some slight indication, in the early part of the second act, of the lurking fever in the ascetic's blood. But I do not believe that this was his intention at all. I believe he regarded Graham as a fine character genuinely conquered by the conviction that Lady Arden's beautiful body was irradiated by a no less beautiful soul. If that—as I cannot doubt—was Mr. Hichens' view of the case, then I repeat that he has omitted to write the play he had in mind.

Or again—a thought occurs to me—are we to suppose that at the moment when she embraces the little seamstress in the second act an actual revolution takes place in Lady Arden's character, frivolity and cynicism fall away from her, and "the real woman" stands revealed to Graham's penetrating and unerring intuition? This theory is partly borne out by Lady Arden's speech in the third act: "I looked love and death in the eyes, my caprice withered in the shadow of death, and I was very, very sorry." I will not consider whether this sudden conversion is psychologically credible, for before it can be credible it must be clear, and that it certainly is not. The fault may, perhaps, lie partly with Miss Evelyn Millard, whose beauty is not seconded by any great variety of resource; but Mr. Hichens has certainly not made the character-problem easy for her. So far as she goes, the figure of Lady Arden is gracefully and agreeably touched; but the distinction between the unreal and "the real woman" is at no time clear to us. Let me add that Hugh Graham (Mr. Henry Ainley) returns to Poplar a sadder and wiser man, that Lady Arden marries the faithful Vernon (Mr. Allan Aynesworth), and that the villain (Mr. Herbert Waring) goes off gnashing his teeth.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Short Studies.

AN ORDEAL.

A WOMAN stood listlessly at the window of a studio, looking out over tree-tops to the blue river widening toward the sea, and the low wooded hills on the further bank, with cornfields on their lower slopes. The loveliness of the scene made no appeal to her. She had been striving, by the aid of old notes and sketches, to recall the beauty of Florence, that it might possess her soul and bring the peace of past days. But the effort had been in vain. She could not banish from her memory the figures of women toiling up the steep wind-swept streets of the town, bent beneath their burden of sacks, children dragging sacks in wooden hand-carts that they might help their mothers to earn a few pence at the coarse sewing, stunted men loafing at the street corners or gathered in apathetic groups at the centre of the town. She saw the tall buildings separated by yards from which a foul stench rose, and she climbed the dark, narrow stairs to squalid rooms where men and women and children were herded together. She traversed in imagination room after room of the factory which was the source of her husband's wealth. She noted the tired faces of the girls tending the noisy machines in the heat and glare of the gas, the misshapen forms of the men, worth, so her husband told her, but little wages, as they lacked the strength and vigor of men. She thought of the ill-nourished, shivering children whom she had met coming out of a school in the heart of the town.

Would those boys do a man's share of the world's work in the days to come, and earn a man's wage? Would the lot of their children be a happier one? The forces of evil seemed very strong in the land, and she knew of no opposing good in whose power she could put faith. A cloud of horror, the counterpart of the physical cloud of smoke, hung over the town, and the beauty of her own home only made it seem the darker. Now this cloud enveloped her husband also. She had lost sight of the good comrade who had come to her in the days of loneliness following her mother's death, and had persuaded her that he needed her now, and she must go back with him to the Scottish town where his work lay.

Her husband had gone down to his works that afternoon with something like despair at his kindly heart. He had brought his wife from Fiesole, where her girlhood had been spent, without a thought of any change for her beyond that of climate. At first she had taken pleasure in their home, with its gardens sloping down to the river, but the stupor which followed on her perception of the neighboring misery and poverty perplexed him. He had hoped that she would soon accept the inevitable as they all accepted it, and share their efforts to ameliorate the lot of special sufferers. But she would sit with a look of still horror on her face, and he could not rouse her by talk of the pictures they had seen together, the books they had both read. He had failed to make the woman he loved happy. If she had trusted and loved him more would the effect of outer things have been so desolating? Should he give up his business and take her back to Italy, or would they emerge from the present shadow only to become the querulous idlers without duties, and incapable of seizing pleasure, whose fate had often made him shudder?

* * *

The lights flashed out among the trees on the further bank of the river. The woman stood motionless, her forehead pressed against the window-pane, heedless of the heavy steps in the hall outside, the whispers and opening of doors, a servant's stifled scream. A man entered the room. She turned, thinking it was her husband, and recognised in the twilight the white face of a doctor who was his closest friend.

"I have bad news for you," he said, "very bad news. There has been an accident at the mill, and your husband is seriously injured."

"He is dead. You mean he is dead. Tell me the truth."

"Yes, that is the truth."

Her lips formed the words, "How did it happen?"

"He was caught in a piece of machinery, and killed at once."

"Take me to him." She followed blindly.

The servants gathered in a frightened group round the men who had brought the body home.

"The Lord ha'e mercy on us all. This is awfu'!" said an old foreman. "There was a laddie killed at Follyshaw's last week. He was caught in the belting through going ower near a machine that should ha'e been fenced by rights. And noo the boss has gone the same road. You wouldna ha'e expectit sae little care fra' him, being born and bred in the mill, as ye might say. He was takin' a look at the engines in the diet hour, and wull ha'e forgotten the time when they started again at three o'clock. I am thinking he must ha'e had somewhat preying on his mind."

MONICA MOORE.

Letters from Abroad.

PARTIES IN THE ITALIAN ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A superficial observer, considering the bitter struggles which accompanied the Italian general elections in the past, might come to the conclusion that the present electoral campaign is proceeding amidst general apathy. The truth is that there is no vital problem of home policy dividing the people, as is proved by the programmes themselves of Premier Giolitti and Baron Sonnino, the leader of the Opposition, which, although suggesting slightly different methods of government, are identical in substance. Thus for the first time in Italian parliamentary history the electors go to the polls without the traditional speeches either from the Premier and the Ministers or the leaders of the Constitutional Opposition.

This, however, does not mean that there is a lack of interest in the result of the vote which will take place on March 7th. It must above all be considered that the present elections are practically forced upon the Government and the country. According to the Italian Constitution a "Legislature"—that is to say, the period between one election and another—cannot exceed five years, but it is the custom that no Legislature shall live out its life. The reason for this is that the Constitution also establishes that once the Chamber is dissolved a new Chamber must be convoked within four months, thus making the general elections imperative in that period. As this constitutional necessity might be inconvenient and dangerous owing to internal or international complications, all Premiers have preferred to obtain permission from the King for the dissolution of the Chamber some time before the end of the Legislature, in order to choose the most appropriate moment for the general elections. Signor Giolitti followed the same rule, and, while the present Legislature which has just ceased to exist could have continued until the autumn of this year, he preferred to dissolve the Chamber, and take the elections at short notice. Evidently he feared that complications of an international character might occur in the spring, and have their echo in Italy. In other words, if not the official relations, the feeling between Austria and Italy is such that, although the two countries participate in the same alliance, and are therefore nominal allies, it is plain that if the annexation of Bosnia Herzegovina and the anger felt here over the Italian University in Austria were followed by some other example of high-handed Austrian policy in the Balkans, it would be impossible to prevent a serious explosion of resentment. This is not desired either by the men who are now in power or by the leaders of the Opposition. Both are united in the wish to avoid the outburst of electioneering speeches, which would have inevitably led to anti-Austrian manifestations.

The most interesting feature of the struggle of this week is the participation of the Clericals in the elections of a considerable number of constituencies. This has led to what is called the "Bloc" of the Extreme parties, comprising Radicals, Republicans, and Socialists, who, with the exception of Milan, where they fight each other, have joined forces against the Clericals. The latter, however, are prevented by Papal instructions from forming a party of their own. Pius X., as in the former elections of 1904, has to all intents and purposes removed the non Expedit, viz., the prohibition to Catholics to participate in the political arena. But this participation may only take place in those constituencies where there is the danger of an avowed enemy of the Church being elected, and on condition that the unsuccessful candidates of the Clericals shall not unite to form a Catholic or Papal party. This permission to vote does not extend indiscriminately to all the constituencies of Italy, but only to those where the danger I have mentioned is held to exist, in which case the Catholics do not even need to have a candidate of their own, but are allowed to vote for any candidate who gives guarantees that he will not side with the enemies of the Church. There are therefore about 25 pure Clerical candidates, while in many more constituencies the Clericals go to the polls to vote for Conservative candidates against anti-Clerical Liberals or against candidates of the extreme parties.

A peculiarity of these general elections is that there is not even the least idea of overthrowing the Cabinet or considerably modifying the majority which supported the Government up to the dissolution of the Chamber. The failure of Baron Sonnino during his three months' Premiership, three years ago, is too recent to give him the ascendency and the power necessary to revive the Constitutional Opposition. The real fight is between Clericals and Extremists. In some cases the Clericals support Ministerial candidates when these are opposed to anti-Clerical Socialists, Republicans or Radicals, and in other cases they support anti-Ministerialist candidates when the Ministerialists are anti-Clericals, so that the question of pro and con the Government has nothing to do with determining their attitude.

The Socialists, owing to internal dissensions, are more than anything else preoccupied in maintaining their former positions. Enrico Ferri, once their most virulent representative, after a lecturing tour in South America has abandoned the leadership of the party, is merely looking to his re-election in the constituency of Gonzaga, and is preparing for the future advent of a Radico-Socialist Cabinet of which he might be a member. Filippo Turati, rival of Ferri, and leader of another section of the Socialists, is personally directing in Milan his party's campaign against the candidates of the other two factions of the Extreme Left. The same antagonism between Socialist and Republican candidates exists in all the constituencies of Romagna, which includes the provinces of Ravenna and Forli, while in Rome, Deputy Bissolati, editor of the "Avanti" organ of the Socialist party, conducts the propaganda for the union of Socialists, Republicans, and Radicals against the Clericals. Bissolati himself is a candidate of the "Bloc" in one of the constituencies of Rome against the candidate supported by the Conservatives and the Clericals.

The climax of the peculiarities of the present elections is reached in the constituency of Montegiorgio. Here Father Romolo Murri, a priest already suspended by the Vatican for his Christian Democratic doctrines in opposition to the teachings of Pius X., stands supported by a large contingent of Clericals and by the whole of the Socialists of the place. In his programme he says that if the electors send him to the Chamber he will sit with the Extreme Left, and will urge that the State should leave religion free to conduct its propaganda. On the other hand he insists that religion in its turn shall not interfere in economic and political questions, especially abstaining from opposing the efforts of the proletariat to organise and reach a better condition of social life.

The Republican party has remained in Italy more than anything else the party of a platonic ideal, and it is not likely that it will emerge strengthened from the vote of March 7th or the second ballot of the Sunday after. With the exception of a few Republican centres still existing, most of the Republican Deputies are elected not because of their political faith, but on account of their personal qualities, including the mildness of their propaganda and their apparent indifference to the speedy success of their cause.

The Radicals, indeed, are full of enthusiasm. They hope that the near future is theirs. They believe that, uniting all the young forces of the country, they may be able to bring about a revival both in the internal and international policy of the peninsula, freeing her at home from the excessive and, in our days, useless dominance of Protection, and abroad from the tutelage, active or latent, of any Foreign Power. They think that only this combined action on home and foreign policy will ensure the long period of peace necessary to the education of the masses and to the development of the national resources, especially in the Southern provinces and the islands.—Yours, &c.,

SALVATORE CORTESI.

Rome, March 2nd.

Communications.

THE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON COMMISSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The announcement last Saturday of another Royal Commission on the University of London must have come as a surprise to most people. That both Oxford and Cambridge are in need of some inquiry was widely known, but that a university which has been the subject of two Royal Commissions within twenty-one years, and has run on the lines of the later only since 1900, should have another in 1909, seemed to border on reprehensible restlessness. But it may be asserted at once that neither the University which asked for the Commission, nor the Government which has granted it, is pulling up a plant frivolously for amusement or seriously for scientific curiosity. The eight years have sufficed to show that in important respects the structure set up by the last Royal Commission is unable to fulfil the momentous task of organising and providing University education for the inhabitants of London. It has tried; it has had some success; but the duty laid upon it is beyond its powers, and reform is inevitable.

The foremost cause of trouble is the dualism of the structure: a teaching University for London is yoked to an Imperial Examining Board for all comers; and more, the statutes bind both sides to aim at entire uniformity in every degree and certificate which is conferred, whether the student comes from a full college course in London or has gathered knowledge wholly unaided, or from a correspondence system which has captured more than half of the students from outside. All regulations are made as nearly identical as possible, and jealous eyes from the "external" side, as it is called, watch every attempt of London professors to treat examination as a test for the results of the particular teaching given, rather than as a magic wand conferring distinction per se on anyone who can steer through miscellaneous examination papers constructed expressly so as to suit no teaching in particular. The better the teachers the more liberty they desire; and they feel sure that, with some assistance from outside examiners, they can offer better testimony to the comparative merits of their students than is offered by the results of examinations constructed wholly by outsiders. On the other hand the tradition of these external examinations is now more than sixty years old, and their supporters have proved unwilling to allow the teachers the influence exercised in every other British University, far less than that which is taken as a natural right in every University in Germany. For a time there seemed some prospect of harmony: leading members on both sides were on excellent terms personally; but the incongruity was too deep-seated, and when some recent convocation elections took the form of evicting from the senate some old members who had leaned too much towards the internal side in favor of new members of a more purely external temper, it was evident that the experiment had failed. It will be one prominent purpose of the Commission to reconsider this situation. Evidence will be offered in favor of making the internal and the external sides wholly independent. One thing seems clear: that the purely examining side has been effective for good in the past is beyond doubt, though the new Universities in England and Wales have very much diminished its range of usefulness. But the problem of next pressing urgency is the organisation of University work in London in a way which will make teaching and research the principal thing, and examinations simply tests and evidences that these are going on efficiently. The solution certainly seems to lie in the abolition of the incongruous dualism which has failed, and the independence of the two sides of the composite University.

Another great problem is raised by the foundation of the great Imperial College of Science and Technology last year. It has taken over the old Royal College of Science and the Guilds Institute, and will enlarge upon these. Its governing body is unwilling to subject its fortunes to the University as at present constituted, yet plainly it could not remain outside a body to which a Royal Charter had entrusted higher education and research all over the London area. It can come in, and will come in willingly, provided the University is remodelled. Various plans have been thought of, and these will now be discussed. The admission of so great an institution calls for a revision of the government of the University, and this is also asked for in the interests of the colleges and institutions already included. At present a senate of fifty-six members, drawn from incongruous sources, is not only the legislative body, but it is also the executive, as it possesses no powers of delegation of executive functions. The revival of the composition of the senate, and the construction of executive syndicates or delegacies under it is plainly a necessity.

Another urgent reform is demanded by those concerned with medical education. The London medical schools are in low estate, compared with what they ought to be. This partly arises from the fact that study in them leads to University degrees only to a very limited extent, owing to the confinement of the degrees to candidates of honors standard. Hence the sons of residents in London resort freely to the Scottish Universities, in spite of the unique teaching power and hospital resources which lie at hand near their own homes.

A further need is that various electoral trusts in London should be examined in order to consider how far they are being administered in relation to a comprehensive scheme, and how far they are being frittered away, however conscientiously, on the part of the trustees. With every respect for local and historical associations, it is desirable that overlapping and useless competition should be reduced, with all the loss that comes from lack of order and system.

There is also a vast range of problems lying outside the border of what is usually considered to be University education proper. The work of the polytechnics, now happily placed in various quarters of the metropolis, the University extension system, the scattered attempts at commercial and technical training, all need bringing into order; and the public may rest assured that whatever benefit can come to these from a connection with a great University will be carefully retained and fostered.

Hitherto we have spoken only of education; but what about the advancement of learning and science in themselves? The meagreness of the provision for this in London is a by-word among observers who know what is provided in Germany, France, and America. It is from London that India is governed, yet Berlin does more for Sanskrit scholarship than London does; Manchester has finer chemical and physical laboratories than London has; medical students leave us for Paris and Vienna to pursue researches on the higher levels; Russians come over to teach us to read our own national records. We have some promising young institutions, notably the School of Economics, and the School of Tropical Medicine, and some old ones, as the Royal Institution and the Society of Arts. But a policy is wanted which shall co-ordinate into a scheme what we have already, and provide for the many functions which are lacking. The Commissioners are instructed therefore to consider what facilities "the Metropolis should afford for specialists and advanced students," as well as to take into account what is already possessed.

In all these matters we need not lose sight of the fact that Oxford and Cambridge have the oldest and the highest places in the national regard, and that the new Universities in our great cities have their claims also. It is incumbent on the Commission to devise its scheme for London as a member of the comity of British Universities, and in no other spirit. The personnel of the Commission is a guarantee for width of view based on experience of various University systems. Mr. Haldane, the Chairman, himself studied at Edinburgh and at Göttingen; Lord Milner and Sir Robert Morant hail from Oxford, Sir Robert Romer and Mr. E. B. Sargant from Cambridge, Dr. McCormick from Scottish and German Universities; no one of them is in any way committed by a present connection with the University of London itself; whilst in power to organise, the Commission is singularly rich, and assuredly no petty or narrow proposals are likely to find favor with men of their calibre and experience.

Readers of this journal will, no doubt, ask themselves what attitude should be adopted by those who regard Universities as essential instruments of well-being in a democratic community. Liberals will always keep in front view the principles of equality of educational opportunity for all citizens according to their capacities, and of efficiency in the application of all public funds devoted to research. On the latter point, we can simply say that the guiding idea must be to afford free scope for the men and women who are supported by endowments or public grants to devote their talents and their zeal to the advancement of learning and science; and, according as this is aimed at, Liberals will judge the proposals which the Commission will make. On the former point, that of education in its higher ranges Liberals will naturally look for a University which shall open wide doors for all students who show promise of ability to profit by access to teaching, to libraries, and to laboratories, whether for preparation for professions or for the satisfaction of their intellectual aspirations. The present colleges and institutions have been trying to do both of these things so far as inadequate resources and lack of co-ordination have allowed. If anything like success is to be achieved by the Commission there is not a studious young man or young woman in London who will not find that for him or her an easier access has been opened to the stored gains of the past and a freer participation in the intellectual enterprises of the present. Every one must feel interest and hope in the arduous labors now to be undertaken by Mr. Haldane and his colleagues; by none can interest be felt more keenly and hope entertained more ardently than by those whose general thought moves on Liberal lines.—Yours, &c.,

A Liberal Graduate.

March 1st, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

THE EDUCATION OF TURKISH WOMEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—You published in October of last year a letter from a Turkish lady—Mme. Salih—in which the needs of Turkey in regard to women's education were put most eloquently before your readers. The writer pleaded for our sympathy and help because she felt that only by obtaining English and American co-operation could her country really get what it needs at this critical period of her development. As a result largely of that letter, I went out to Turkey for a short visit, from which I have recently returned with impressions so remarkable and interesting that I am heartily grateful to you for having been in any degree the means of my going.

While I was in Constantinople the Minister of Public Instruction asked me to make a short report on such schools as they have, with suggestions as to what seemed to me the desirable changes to be made in their system. In doing this I had the opportunity of seeing something of all their schools, and as a result of my report it seems probable that a Bill will be passed for establishing regular State schools for girls as well as boys throughout the Empire.

It is difficult for us in England to realise where the Turks stand with regard to education. They are neither in the condition of the "untutored savage," as some people fancy, nor have they got a modern European system, such as others dimly imagine. The truth seems to be that they have for a long time had the shadow of the thing and hardly any of the substance. A very large number can read and write, and yet such a subject as Constitutional history has been possible, even in the highest university classes, only since July. Again—to use a distinction which some of the prominent Young Turks are themselves fond of making—they have had instruction without education; i.e., pure book-learning without anything of mental, physical, or moral training correlated with it. Yet the humble schools attached to the mosques, where the floor is filled with tiny creatures who kneel on cotton pads at desks about eighteen inches high, attract the larger number of the village children, to whom school, no doubt, appears as inevitable as it does to our own babies. There they rock reverently to and fro while they read the Koran, and there through nearly three long years they struggle with the endless transformations of Arabic letters till they can at last trace out the mazy curves with accuracy. This is Ibtidaiyeh, or the Beginning, and among the girls many, if not most, stop here. I saw three schools in which girls could continue their studies, but in none of them did there appear to be any understanding of the wider educational principles.

And it is precisely these which are of the most importance in Turkey to-day. A despotism cannot exist without effects. The despotism of Abdul Hamid has had the direful effect of crippling the power of independent thought and action of hundreds of his subjects who to-day are comparatively useless to their country through having been divorced from affairs for so long. But the women have suffered under a double despotism—the despotism of government and the infinitely more terrible despotism of sex. The natural efficiency of the Turkish womanhood has undoubtedly been thus weakened. "We talk and we talk, and we don't know what to do; we are all in a muddle like Turkey herself," as one of them said to me. Now although few things can be predicted as to how any country will develop, I think it is fairly safe to say that some attention is bound to come in the social arrangements of the Turks. Their women, though they may not for generations reach the point which Westerners so glibly talk of as "throwing off the veil," will necessarily get more freedom and a larger share in public activities. Such a change, even if it were limited in extent, would be little short of revolutionary. There are great dangers involved in it, and chances of complete shipwreck for many. It is hard to imagine how things could possibly get readjusted.

And it is in the solution of some of the difficulties that a demand is made upon ourselves for help. In Europe we women have long made experiments in living, and the lessons we have learnt permeate our systems of education. It is by giving of the best in our own educational methods that we can be of use to Turkey to-day. It is not for foreigners to bring about social changes in any community, but when they are once determined on, it would be selfish heartlessness not to give them the support of our own experience. At this juncture the Turkish lady who has taken part in a debate or knows how a committee is conducted is a much sought-after person; and the less superficial qualities which are engendered in the best English and American schools for girls are things of which the East stands at present in the greatest need.

As a case in point, I would adduce the curious incapacity for combination which shows itself among the women. A proposal of any sort is no sooner made than its supporters fall into antagonistic groups. Each group elaborates a new scheme from which once more the individuals withdraw themselves to attempt to carry out their own variants independently of impracticable coadjutors.

But it may very likely be asked, "Can you ever look for business-like capacity, for loyal co-operation in important affairs, from Turkish women? Is it not asking something completely foreign to their nature?" I do not think so. Indeed, I am convinced that they only need training to comprehend and acquire those great virtues which accompany a sense of responsibility.

There is one institution which has been offering such training for many years past to Oriental girls—viz., the American College for Girls at Scutari (Constantinople). This was founded some thirty years ago, and was supported until just recently by the American Missions Board, which, with extraordinary wide-mindedness, appreciated that a need for really first-rate female education existed in the Balkans, and in the lands round the Black Sea and Levant. I stayed in the college for some little time, and I cannot speak too warmly of the work that it is doing. Eleven or twelve nationalities and five or six religions are frequently to be found within its walls. Pupils from the Euphrates may be class-mates of others from Bulgaria, the Caucasus, Hungary, and Albania. All share in the general studies, such as English, French, mathematics, science, the history of Constantinople, &c., while each also receives instruction in her own language, literature, and history. A little veiled Turkish lady comes across from Stamboul to teach Turkish; a Bulgarian gentleman takes the numerous Bulgarian girls, while an Armenian gives instruction in both modern and ancient Armenian. And although the college has owed its existence to the missionary spirit, it has never been a proselytizing agency. Far from it. I do not know for certain of any girl who has changed her religion as a result of having been there. I doubt if such exists. But I do know that I have rarely met people who treat the religion of others with greater sympathy, reverence, and appreciation than do the members of the college staff. In all the years of its existence, however, the college has had but few Turkish pupils. To send their daughters there, even when the permission of the Sheikh ul Islam had been obtained, meant for the fathers constant espionage, constant threats and annoyances, and sometimes exile—as in the case of a high palace official, whose wife had actually been one of the Sultan's harem.

But of those few who, undeterred by all the difficulties, have passed through the college course, there are several who already stand out in the history of their country, and have bravely served in the ranks of the reformers. Their lives are the proof of the value of the college, and of the great need for it to continue to carry on its work now, when at last the Turks are flocking to it without fear.

But the college is at this very moment threatened with a serious crisis. During the last few months the connection between it and the Missions' Board has been severed. This has been done in a spirit of high-mindedness, which one cannot help greatly admiring. The board felt itself bound to consider the claims of proselytizing work as prior to those of higher education, and the college on its side felt that its hands would be freer to serve the community in the best possible way if it ceased to have any indebtedness to missionary funds.

The result unfortunately is that it is now almost paralysed for want of money just when it ought to be enlarging its borders. It is hard to know whom to apply to, and, so far, all efforts at raising a proper endowment fund have been very discouraging. The people who support missions are apt to hesitate when there is no likelihood of making converts, and those who care for education generally consider that their own country comes first and last. Will not some of your readers help? I will gladly furnish them with full details, and I feel sure that if I could make them realise the good the college is doing, they would willingly exert themselves to keep such a noble institution in efficient existence.—Yours, &c., ISABEL FRY.

239, Marylebone Road, N.W.
February 28th, 1909.

CONSCRIPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Herbert M. Wyatt, Commander R.N., is doubtless a first-rate officer, but not being a statesman he overlooks treaties and their obligations, and he also writes as if Germany might for her own ends run a complication of risks, which, in the end and at the best, might be supposed to annoy but could not end our existence as a nation. Nations do not set about conquest in the position Commander Wyatt seems to think; indeed, we might imagine that he had lately read that amusing brochure, "If," by the authors of "Wisdom while you wait," and was struck by its simplicity as a solvent of problems.

Mr. A. H. Craven should really submit himself to an examination in "heredity," or on "the origin of species" and "the preservation of favored races." He might then learn better than to write such nonsense about the craven Englishman who is conquered in turn by Roman, Dane, and Norman, and might be under the foot of the Boer but for the happy interposition of Colonists, descended from those very cravens. Such letters do not help an argument, but only confuse issues.—Yours, &c.,

February 28th, 1909. A. GRIMSHAW HAYWOOD.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A letter headed "Conscription" in your number of February 20th seems to call for some reply.

What is "militarism" except the very thing the writer describes as a virtuous state of mind; that is, "a just contempt" on the part of the profession, those in the fighting trade, for the people who want to live at peace with their neighbors and do not share the Jingo spirit? We cannot, of course, blame those who are in the trade, professionally, for wanting to promote its ends by any, and every, means, although we do object to the compulsion being attempted now, as much as we object to the ruses applied by the publican to get more drink sold.

It is quite true that the moral fibre of the nation has been weakened, but it certainly is not from lack of war. We have had our war, and the moral standard of the nation has been lowered. If any evidence of this is needed we have only to recall such days in London as "Mafficking," and another similar one, the remembrance of which is a cause of shame to all who love their country. Probably they lowered our prestige more than any dropping of "Dreadnoughts" could ever do. The Italians say, "Before the Boer war the English were our moral leaders, now we have none."

The theory that the discipline needed to make, or to restore, character, can be found in "Conscription," only requires a talk with those who have had some experience of it to be dissipated to the winds. To put your will, and your soul, under "mother superior," priest or soldier, is a return to the dark ages, and is enslavement, not discipline. We do not deny that there are weak characters to whom a form of hypnotism may be beneficial, but for the full-grown man it is retrogression, not progression.

The untruthfulness of the literature now being circulated in this country, alone shows how poor the case is, and how cowardly its object. One book tries to make people believe that any moment the Germans may invade our shores without any kind of warning. In the present day this is a sheer impossibility. Some quarrel must be got up first or what good is our Foreign Secretary? In the case of the last war it was largely done by a chartered press, and it is said to have been very hard work to lash the country up into a state of passion for the purposes of the war. Some of those who fought in that war say that it can never be done in the same way again. Wars amongst civilised people depend on the concealment of facts. A great war correspondent said, "If we told you what really happened in war there would never be another." It is this truth which gives one so much hope about the future. Science is on the side of peace because it becomes more and more a great and rapid revealer of truth. Marconi can always be tapped, and the flying machine is working towards internationalism.

The most serious "muddle" in the letter of February 20th is in the end of it. The writer seems to mix up the fight and struggle against evil that Christianity calls for, as if that fight required us to enter one of the killing professions, and murder one another. Nothing can be further from the teachings of Christ and the teachings of history. Where are we told that we must not kill those who in one century happen to be under the same flag, but we may kill those who for a little period are under another? "I came not to bring peace but a sword." Does any intelligent person believe that means that we are to slay our brother man when some bad tempered ruler has picked a quarrel with another, or some great financier wants a little more gold? How does the moral fibre of a nation benefit by fighting for such causes? An unprovoked attack requiring a war of self-defence is no longer on the horizon of civilised nations, for more and more the best interests of the masses of the people in the different countries are identical. As a matter of fact the interests of the working men in Germany and England are much nearer together than the interests of the landlord classes and the laborers in the two lands. Education will make this more and more evident. "Peace is not, and cannot be, an ideal of human life." That is true, but where is there any lack of warfare for the soldier of Christ, and who ever needs to go into physical warfare to promote the coming of His kingdom? The doctor and nurse who go into a smallpox hospital, to save life, illustrate the kind of discipline and courage that a nation needs. We can raise the moral fibre of our people if we keep steadily before them who their real enemies are. Building of "Dreadnoughts," to be superseded by other inventions every few years, must lead, through taxation, directly to the end of the British Empire, while the prestige we are vainly seeking can be gained by setting our own house in order. There is a book just published, called the "Evolution of Modern Germany," which shows how when Germany was poor, and had no great military system she produced so many men whose influence was world-wide. Kant and Fichte, Goethe and Schiller, lived before Germany became a great military power, and yet those were the days of her "prestige," and influence over the mind of the world. Since she has devoted her attention to the lower ideal of brute force she no longer produces these great men. The reign of militarism is the day of a nation's decline, and are we fast drifting into it also? To prepare for war is, and always has been, to bring about war. The theory of evolution, and the teachings of history, largely prove that the first nation that can raise its moral fibre and courage to the point of resisting the building of "Dreadnoughts," and put down great armies, must eventually lead the world. Truly "we are come to the dividing of the ways." Shall this great future be England's or another's?—Yours, &c., S.

THE POLICY OF THE NAVY LEAGUE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of February 27th, you ask, does the Navy League "admit safety on the basis of a programme of four 'Dreadnoughts' this year? The answer is emphatically yes."

With a view to correcting this mis-statement, I would draw your attention to the Navy League pronouncement issued on Trafalgar Day last, in which it is explicitly stated, "We require to lay down eight large armored ships a year if we are to be able to meet this emergency."

I trust that you may see your way to giving publicity to this statement, which is the "Navy League" statement.

The "Navy League Annual" is written by gentlemen who express their own opinion, which may or may not concur with that of the Executive Committee. It is especially stated at the commencement of that work that "Opinions expressed in this volume are personal to the writers, and do not necessarily reflect the policy of the Navy League."—Yours, &c.,

WM. CAIUS CRUTCHLEY, Secretary.

13, Victoria Street, London, S.W.
March 2nd, 1909.

[Only eight? Why not eighteen?—ED., NATION.]

SUFFRAGETTE TACTICS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is perhaps not surprising that there should exist some confusion in the public mind as to the precise position of the Women's National Anti-Suffrage League. It appears to be an eleventh-hour league formed to combat the final phases of development arising out of an original movement of some fifty years' standing. But the hon. secretary of the Kensington branch of the A.S.L., in her letter of this week's issue of THE NATION, denies that the league is directed against any special final development: she harks right back to the essence of the original movement, and declares that the A.S.L. is formed to protest against the enfranchisement of any woman. If this be the exact position of the A.S.L., the attitude is one which might have been effective had it been adopted earlier in the day. But at this late date it gives an impression of mere intolerance of well-established opinion, because progression on these lines must inevitably be everywhere hampered, and even haunted by the many thousands of records left by many thousands of women—many thousands of women who, under the exigencies of a controversy so prolonged, have meanwhile passed away; but passed away only to bequeath legacies of the faith that was in them to successive and increasing inheritors.

The dominant aim of the A.S.L., if it be accurately described as opposition to the enfranchisement of any women, seems to be confused by the last paragraph in the letter which begins: "We contend that the only basis on which women can be enfranchised is adult suffrage." Passing over that, however, as confusion possibly due to my own misinterpretation of the hon. secretary's meaning—who certainly goes on to say, "How many supporters of women's suffrage are prepared to follow their proposal to its logical conclusion, &c., &c. . . ?"—I should like to raise my own modest protest against the inference that all supporters of woman's suffrage do believe adult suffrage to be its logical conclusion. Is there to be no differentiation between revolution and reform? History discloses a very marked differentiation, and even gives us many instances of the power of a wise reform to scotch a nascent revolution. And surely adult suffrage is in the nature of a revolution in that it probably and almost certainly would transfer the "sovereign power" from the hands of men to the hands of women, the bare mention of which possibility has often, I am sure, called up visions of upheavals tremendous enough to make any mere revolution pale. Woman's suffrage is neither revolution nor upheaval. The balance of responsible masculine power would remain in masculine hands to the tune of something like six male voters to one female voter—a sufficient margin of electoral force, one would imagine, for the forceful sex.

Woman's suffrage, then, is a reform: a reform which contains no element of revolution, but is, in part, an expression of man's increasing need of an efficient helpmeet; in part, the response of woman to the race-call which stirs with ever-increasing sense of responsibility and intelligence, the sensitive and willing spirit of all maternity.—Yours, &c., LUCY GARDNER PAGET (Mrs. Gerald Paget),

72, Albert Hall Mansions, Kensington Gore,
February 29th, 1909.

STRIKES AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Among the many causes of unemployment so ably laid before us by you and others, I have not seen much, if any, reference to the operation of strikes. Some years ago I asked one of our captains—I might almost call him a field marshal—of commercial industry if he would not take the trouble to find out how much trade has been dislocated, lost, and sent abroad by these cruel and crushing labor wars. Even in the few instances where they are successful, they leave a mournful legacy of wrecked homes, shattered constitutions, and embittered lives which no pecuniary success can indemnify; and when they fail, may Heaven help the victims of the complacent, well fed, well paid "boss," who pulls the strings at a distance, without inconvenient knowledge of the circumstances of the case. My friend did not respond to my appeal, but Sir Christopher Furness has nobly thrown himself into the breach, and has not only probed the canker, but devised a sound and sufficient remedy, the great merit of which is the hostility which it has excited in the tub-thumping class who preach in the park and in the House and on platforms the nebulous and impracticable theories which are comprised under the comprehensive term of Socialism.

Perhaps some of the other readers of your admirable and inspiring paper may take up this question, and correct me if I am wrong?—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT FARQUHARSON.

Grand Hotel du Louvre, Mentone,
February 22nd, 1909.

"SOME FATUITIES OF PROTECTION."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Surely the remarks which you make on the subject of foreign investment of British capital in your article on "Some Fatuities of Protection" miss the real point at issue. You say that "The contention that this capital, if it had not been able to find more remunerative foreign investments, would have been used at home in giving more employment to British labor, is absolutely false," and you go on to point out that "the capital that goes abroad either in good times or bad, does so because it is not needed here."

But that is precisely the point which I understand the Tariff Reformer to make. He does not contend that the capital, which (according to his view) our Free Trade system is driving abroad, could while that system endures be used here in employing British labor. On the contrary, he most unequivocally alleges that it is precisely because present conditions prevent the remunerative employment of capital in this country that capital is driven abroad. In other words, he agrees with you that the reason why capital goes abroad is "because it is not needed here," but he goes one step further and adds that it is not needed here because of our Free Trade system. As to the question whether the outflow of British capital can be called "a loss," —no doubt to speak of foreign investments as a thing to be deprecated in every case is quite fallacious. On the other hand, can it be seriously contended that a sudden increase of such investments is always a healthy symptom?

Assume that the credit of a country suffers a heavy blow. Would not a large outflow of the capital of that country be the almost immediate result?—Yours, &c.,

H. W. Goldberg.

11, New Court, Carey Street, W.C.

[In order to make good his case, the Tariff Reformer must show that by a tariff he can increase the aggregate employment of capital in his country. This he fails to do. He can indeed show that protection of a particular trade may increase its employment of capital, if the rise of price Protection brings does not cause a great shrinkage of demand for the goods the trade produces. But in that case the increased expenditure in this class of goods will cause a diminished expenditure on goods produced by other trades, and less capital will be employed remuneratively in those trades.—Ed., Nation.]

THE "OBEDIENCE" OF THE CLERGY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Asquith informed Sir G. Kekewich on Thursday last that every clergyman appointed to a Crown benefice is bound to give an assurance that he will obey the Bishop of the diocese in matters of discipline and ceremonial. The course in question appears to be fraught with grave possibilities, and to go beyond the requirements of the oath of canonical obedience. What would be its effect in regard, for example, to any of the following matters: if a Bishop were to require a clerk, so pledged, to refuse the Holy Communion to a man and woman married under the provisions of the Deceased Wife's Sister Act; or to demand either the celebration of the Holy Communion in the evening, or the cessation of that practice; or that the eastward position of the celebrant at Holy Communion be adopted or relinquished?

In such conceivable cases a Crown presentee might find himself in a strange dilemma—on the one hand conscientiously bound by the terms of his "assurance," on the other equally conscientiously unable to "obey the Bishop of the diocese." And what of its results upon a diocese, to say nothing of individual parishes, ruled by successive Bishops of different opinions on these or kindred points? Is not a demand for an obedience beyond that guaranteed by the oath of canonical obedience ultra vires?—Yours, &c.,

Presbyter X

A VOICE FROM SOUTH EDINBURGH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I am a voter in South Edinburgh, and write you on the polling day. There is no cause for alarm as to the Solicitor-General's return, but I shall be agreeably surprised if his majority is not much reduced. Should that be so, it will not be Mr. Dewar's fault. His candidature has been exceptionally well and vigorously conducted, while his personal exposition of Free Trade principles has been at once brilliant and clear. Nor has the worth of the Government's good record suffered in his hands.

Yet so convinced am I of the justness of your position generally in opposition to the dangerous militarism manifesting itself in Mr. Haldane's propaganda and the alarmist expenditure on the Navy as introducing alien and reactionary elements among the goodly heritage of the ideals bequeathed by Liberalism to the democracy, that I feel strongly inclined to withhold my own vote.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is driven to extremes to find the money for the social reforming work to which the Government were called, while Mr. McKenna and Sir John Fisher, pleading jealous dread of a nation whose best citizens would give anything to be delivered from the very incubus our scaremongers are promoting, have millions given them to promote the work which the Liberal majority was elected to counteract.

It may be open to question whether now or later be the better time, as a matter of tactics, for grappling with the House of Lords. To some of us it is becoming so, also, as to whether a Government that is dealing so perilously with the nation's best ideals and their own professions, is entitled to our confidence. I am not so unmindful of, or ungrateful for, the work done, as to vote to-day for a candidate whose unblushing Protectionism raises the most vital of all issues, but I am satisfied that not a few Liberals are unsettled because of the Government's drifting and concessions in the matters referred to, and against which you so ably protest.—Yours, &c.,

R. Henderson Smith.

Edinburgh, March 4th, 1909.

"BRITISH" AND "IRISH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. McPheat, in his interesting letter, makes the statement that, since the Union of Great Britain and Ireland, the United Kingdom is properly known as "Britain." I have not his letter by me, but I think that is what he said.

I have never heard that view expressed, but it is not unusual to find Irish people and Irish things included in the term "British," which, sir, I would submit, is incorrect.

In the Tariff Reform Amendment to the Address a reference was made to "British and Irish" produce, showing that even Mr. Austen Chamberlain acknowledges the distinction. There is also "The British and Irish Steam Packet Co.," &c.

It is often stated that as Ireland is situated in the British Isles, the people are "British." Surely one might as well say that a Zulu is British, because he lives in the British Empire, and is a British subject.—Yours, &c.,

James H. Webb.

Tinoran, Glengarry, Co. Dublin.

Poetry.

ON EXPECTING SOME BOOKS.

To-morrow they will come. I know
How rich their sweet contents are, so
Upon their dress let Fancy play—
Will it be blue, red, green, or grey?
Sweet Books that I have oft heard named,
And seen stand up like blossoms framed,
Through many a common window shown—
When I was moneyless in town;
But never touched their leaves, nor bent
Close to them and inhaled their scent.
They'll come like Snowdrops to a Bee
That, tired of empty dreams, can see
Real flowers at last. Until this time,
Now on the threshold of my prime,
I did not guess my poverty:
That none of these rich books, that lie
Untouched on many a shelf—save when
A housemaid, dreaming of young men,
And music, sport, and dance, and dress,
Will bang them for their dustiness—
That none of these were in my care;
To-morrow I will have them here.
Well do I know their value; they
Will not be purses found, which may
Be full of coppers, nails, or keys—
They will not disappoint, like these.
O, may their coming never cease!
May my Book-family increase!
Clothes, pictures, ornaments of show,
Trinklets and mirrors—these can go
Outside, that all my Books may be Together in one room with me.

William H. Davies.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

A VOLUME of essays dealing with "Darwin and Modern Science," which promises to be of unusual interest and value, will be published shortly by the Cambridge University Press. The book is intended to serve the double purpose of illustrating the wide influence of Darwin's work and the present attitude to it taken by original investigators and thinkers. Professor J. A. Thompson, Darwin's friend and biographer, writes on "Darwin's Relations to his Predecessors," Professor Weismann on "The Selection Theory," Dr. J. G. Frazer on "Some Primitive Theories of the Origin of Man," Professor de Vries on "Variation," Professor Höffding on "The Influence of the Conception of Evolution on Modern Philosophy," and Professor Bury on "Darwinism and History." Among the other contributors are Sir George Darwin, Dr. Francis Darwin, and Professors Haeckel, Poulton, Bateson, Schalbe, and Bouglé. The list of writers is extraordinarily brilliant, and the work will be a splendid commemoration of Darwin's centenary and of the fiftieth anniversary of the publication of "The Origin of Species."

* * *

THERE is a rumor that a collection of Lord Acton's letters may be issued during the coming autumn. It will presumably be produced under the editorial care of Mr. Figgis and Mr. Laurence, who have edited Lord Acton's essays. The "Letters to Mary Gladstone" and the correspondence in Abbot Gasquet's "Lord Acton and His Circle" show that Lord Acton was an admirable letter-writer. We hope, however, that discretion will not be carried to excess in the coming volume, and that fresh light may be thrown upon the inner history of the Vatican Council. In this connection we may say that Mr. Wilfrid Ward's "Life of Newman" is now practically complete. Its publication is certain to cause no less of a sensation than that which attended the issue of Purcell's "Life of Manning."

* * *

MR. F. A. MUMBY, whose well-chosen "Letters of Literary Men" are known and valued by every book lover, has hit upon the happy idea of telling the story of Queen Elizabeth's early life in a series of contemporary letters linked together with a running commentary so as to form a continuous narrative. The letters, some of which will be published for the first time in the coming volume, are said to give the history of Elizabeth's youth—her early indiscretions, her disputed share in Wyatt's rebellion and subsequent imprisonment, and her life at Court in the last years of Queen Mary—with a completeness and familiarity to be found in no other history of the period. The title of the book is "The Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth: A Narrative in Contemporary Letters," and Messrs. Constable will be the publishers.

* * *

THE same publishers are about to issue "The Valley of Shadows," a volume of reminiscences by Mr. Francis Grierson, dealing with Illinois in the period before the Civil War, when the people were preparing to elect Abraham Lincoln and the stir of the approaching conflict was beginning to be felt. Mr. Grierson's first book was written in French, in 1889, and won the praise of the leading Parisian critics. It was followed up ten years later by "Modern Mysticism," and in 1901 by "The Celtic Temperament," two small volumes of essays, rather mannered in style, but containing much sound criticism. An essay on Wagner's music deserves special mention for the clever way in which Mr. Grierson analysed the attitude of the more extreme Bayreuth worshippers.

* * *

THE Oxford University Press has in preparation an edition of Roger Bacon's works, which will contain some hitherto unpublished matter. The editor, Mr. R. Steele, has also made a selection of "Tudor and Stuart Publications," which will be issued by the same publishers. Another book containing matter never before printed, which Mr. Frowde announces, is "Shelley's Prose in the Bodleian." It is to appear under the editorship of Mr. A. H. Koszul, in "The Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry." Mr. Koszul has done a good edition of Shelley's poetry for Messrs. Dent's "Everyman's Library."

* * *

IN spite of its charm and pathos, Dr. Johnson's "Life of Richard Savage" is so full of what Mr. Moy Thomas has shown to be "inherent probabilities and proved falsehoods," that as a narrative of Savage's life it is thoroughly untrustworthy. This is, of course, due to the credence Johnson gave to Savage's own account of his career. There is room, accordingly, for a fresh biography of Savage, in which some attempt will be made to separate truth from falsehood, and we hope that this will be done adequately in Mr. Stanley Makower's "Richard Savage: A Mystery in Biography," which Messrs. Hutchinson announce. Mr. Makower has chosen an excellent subject, for Savage's life was full of dramatic episodes, and its mystery heightens the attraction that surrounds it.

* * *

WE learn that Mr. H. G. Wells has finished a new novel, "Ann Veronica," which will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin in the autumn.

* * *

Two books treating of Napoleon's famous generals are to be issued during the season. "Napoleon's Marshals," by Mr. R. P. Dunn-Pattison, which will be published by Messrs. Methuen, narrates the careers of Soult, Ney, Bernadotte, Masséna, Berthier, Davoust, Lannes, and other leading soldiers selected from among the twenty-six whom Napoleon rewarded with a Field Marshal's bâton. It aims at giving a popular sketch of the material which Napoleon found to hand, and out of which he evolved the leaders of his armies. The other book, called "The Marshals of Napoleon," is by Mr. Percy Cross Standing, and covers the same ground. It is to be published by Messrs. Collier.

* * *

THE Duke of Argyll has put together and annotated a collection of family papers, which, under the title "Argyll Papers," will shortly be published by Messrs. Nisbet. The volume includes several interesting documents of the Napoleonic period, hitherto unpublished letters of Madame de Stael, and other communications of historical interest.

* * *

"THE BODLEIAN" is the title of a little magazine issued by Mr. John Lane. It gives extracts from books published at the Bodley Head, reviews taken from other journals, and information regarding Mr. Lane's future projects. The current issue contains an interview with Mr. Stephen Reynolds, at Seacombe, in which the author of "A Poor Man's House" gives utterance to some characteristic opinions. Those who care for books will always find a publisher's journal interesting, and "The Bodleian" is one of the best of its type that we have seen.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Letters of John Ruskin, 1827-1889." Edited by E. T. Cook and Alexander Wedderburn. (Allen. 2 vols. 25s. each.)

"The Greatness and Decline of Rome." By Guglielmo Ferrero. Translated by the Rev. H. J. Chaytor. Vol. V. "The Republic of Augustus." (Heinemann. 6s. net.)

"Psyche's Task: A Discourse Concerning the Influence of Superstition on the Growth of Institutions." By J. G. Frazer. (Macmillan. 2s 6d. net.)

"Psychology and Crime." By Hugo Münsterberg. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

"Every-Day Japan." By Arthur Lloyd. (Cassell. 12s. net.)

"Notes on the Science of Picture-Making." By C. J. Holmes. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Madrid." By A. F. Calvert. "The Spanish Series." (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Short Cut to India." By David Fraser. (Blackwood. 12s. 6d. net.)

"In re Shakespeare, Beeching v. Greenwood. Rejoinder on Behalf of the Defendant." By G. G. Greenwood, M.P. (Lane. 2s. 6d. net.)

"After the Pardon." By Matilde Serao. (Nash. 6s.)

"The Bishop and the Bogie-Man." By Joel Chandler Harris. (Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

"La Jeunesse de Benjamin Constant, 1767-1794." Par Gustave Rudler. (Paris: Colin. 10fr.)

"La France et ses Colonies au Début du XXe Siècle." Par M. Fallex et A. Mairey. (Paris: Delagrave. 5fr.)

"La Politique de Renan." Par Gaston Strauss. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 7fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE TRAGEDY OF BOSWELL'S LIFE.*

Mr. Seccombe has done well to make Boswell's Letters to Temple the subject of one of his admirable and carefully annotated new editions and to illuminate it with another of those excellent Introductions of his which it is quite superfluous to praise. For the real Boswell, in spite of all that he wrote and all that has been written about him, you cannot rightly understand till you have read this life-long epistolary Confession. Of the Rev. W. J. Temple, with whom Boswell corresponded from the age of eighteen till the last year of his life, Mr. Seccombe tells us all that we need know. He was a fellow-student with Boswell at the University of Edinburgh, and afterwards went to Cambridge, took orders, obtained a small living in Devonshire, and then a better one in Cornwall, which he retained till his death not long after that of his friend. "A dissatisfied, atrabilious man," Mr. Seccombe calls him, troubled with financial and other discomforts, not very happy with his wife, and repining against the dulness and obscurity of his country rectory. Boswell thought highly of his judgment and knowledge, and unbosomed himself to Temple at intervals during six-and-thirty years with a frankness which has hardly a parallel in literature. He is more candid, more unreserved about himself than even in the "Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D.," which, of course, is also to a large extent the autobiography of James Boswell, Esq. These letters are the supplement, the complement, to the masterpiece. They give us Boswell in all his phases of ambition, amorousness, devotion, drink, dissipation, ineffectual repentance, unrealised aspiration, lofty resolution, imperfect achievement, hero-worship, hopefulness, and despair; the passage of the egoistic, agitated, affectionate, self-tormenting Boswellian soul through its troubled pilgrimage upon the earth. Such a human document, so complete, so detailed, so whimsically and mournfully interesting, one does not often find.

It gives us a view of Boswell a little different from either the Carlylean or the Macaulayesque, and it condemns the latter in its superficial harshness and its inexcusable limitation more thoroughly than ever. Yet perhaps if Macaulay had been writing after the publication of the Temple letters (they were first printed six-and-twenty years later than the famous Essay) he might have found in them fresh opportunity for his savage dagger-play upon Boswell's unhonored corpse. "Servile and impertinent, shallow and pedantic, a bigot and a sot"—poor Bozzy; "vain," "childish," "tale-bearing," "an eavesdropper"—you read these Letters and find him all that and more also. How Macaulay would have enjoyed his amorous and sentimental revelations! Mr. Seccombe has provided discreet asterisks here and there; but there is enough left in to show us Boswell a quite worthy rival to Mr. Pepys as an amateur in affairs of the heart and affairs of the senses. "What a fortunate fellow am I!" he writes rapturously after a flirtation with a pretty Irish girl. "What a variety of adventures in all countries!" After giving Temple some highly edifying advice on the subject of a virtuous marriage, he adds the information that he is himself happy in the society of a "dear infidel," a married lady separated from her husband for whom Boswell has set up an establishment. To his own wife he seems to have been really attached, and his grief over her final illness and death was obviously sincere; but his affection for the excellent Mrs. Boswell did not prevent him from indulging in miscellaneous amorosities. "There is a Miss Silverton in the Fly with me, an amiable creature, who has been in France. I can unite little fondnesses with perfect conjugal love." While his wife lay dying, he reproached himself with his "frequent scenes of what I must call dissolute conduct"; his repentance, however, was a good deal quickened by the fact that he had gone out to dinner, got drunk, tumbled off his horse on the way home, and dislocated his shoulder. Boswell's drinking habits were incurable. He was always making strenuous vows of amendment, and always giving way again; especially at the least appearance of anxiety, embarrassment, uneasiness, or self-reproach, from which conditions he was seldom free for long.

Poor Bozzy is really rather a tragic figure in these pages, with all his whims, and humors, and eccentricities, and irrepressible exhibitions of superb self-conceit. One leaves the letters much more inclined to pity their writer than to exult over him with metallic cachinnations. Boswell is commonly regarded as one of the comic personages of literature; no one ever pretends to respect him, and, indeed, it is hard, and was so during his own lifetime, to be respectful towards a being so beset with undignified and even contemptible faults and foibles. Yet, as Carlyle said, his poorer qualities lay open to the general eye; palpable to the dullest his gluttony, his wine-bibbing, his sycophancy, his braggadocio. But below all this, as Carlyle also saw, was another Boswell, kindly, loving, generously eager to recognise and do service to real merit and greatness. Because he was a fool and a snob, says Macaulay, himself writing foolishly on this occasion, Boswell produced the finest biography the world has known. Not because of his folly, says Carlyle more wisely, but in its despite; because he had sympathy, insight, a fine eye for character, a genuine regard for the better and nobler aspects of human nature. It was the contradiction between these two elements in him that made his life, as we see it here mirrored, something very different from the farcical burlesque it appears on the surface. In reality it was a tragedy, the tragedy of laudable intentions and a weak will. Boswell was that most unfortunate of human beings, the person in whom a restless ambition is combined with inadequate self-control. To do something, to be successful, distinguished, important, to make his life "tell," as he said, in some way; this was Boswell's constant obsession. But his aspirations were brought to nought by his want of self-command, his incapacity to pursue any course of action steadily, his uncertainty and irregularity. He was always beginning something, always resolving to make some enterprise a brilliant triumph, always failing of success, always swaying between periods of hope and periods of the deepest despondency. The idea that he was a gay, grinning, peacocking kind of coxcomb, whom nothing touched, is quite erroneous. Boswell was an unhappy man for the most part, with all his volatility and his capacity for absorption in the pleasures of the moment. "I brood over all my complaints," he says in a letter written when he was fifty-one, "the sickly mind which I have had from my early years, the disappointment of my hopes of success in life." He diagnosed his own case correctly. Boswell was distempered mentally from the beginning. He suffered all through from the sick spirit, the divided aims, that bring futility; his life was one long struggle in which he was always losing battles, and always desperately determining to reform his shattered legions and win to victory at last, and meanwhile dropping out for a spell of indolence or self-indulgence. We see it all in this correspondence with Temple—an "amazing transparency," as Mr. Seccombe calls it, full of entertainment, but full also of pathos. At least, if these Letters give us fresh cause to chuckle over poor James Boswell, they allow us to think more kindly of the man whose confused life did after all "tell" so supremely well towards its clouded close for the delight and solace of all who read the English tongue.

* "Letters of James Boswell to the Rev. W. J. Temple." With an Introduction by Thomas Seccombe. Sidgwick & Jackson.

THE DILEMMA OF "MODERNISM."*

When the formation of the Old Catholic body was hailed with enthusiasm by the champions of Anglican Sacerdotalism, Dean Stanley uttered a note of warning. The movements, he pointed out, were going different ways. For the moment they occupied the same ground—that of protest against the Vatican Definition. But the forces underlying the two were radically divergent: the one was making against and away from, the other for and towards, Rome. What the Dean said in 1870 holds good even more obviously of the parallel movement in the Roman Church to-day. Modernism has met with a generous welcome from English

* "Father Tyrrell's Modernism." An expository criticism of "Through Scylla and Charybdis." By Hakluyt Egerton. Kegan Paul. 5s.

Churchmen, Established and Free. That men of the larger school, of which Stanley was a leader, should find themselves in sympathy with it, is natural; in all the Churches liberal thought and feeling move on the same lines. What was surprising, to those who look below the surface, was to find this sympathy in men whose principles and temper were diametrically opposed to those of the Modernists—the High, or sectarian, Anglicans, whose eye is on the past, who repudiate the Reformation, and "speak gently of our sister's fall." For the Modernists do not "speak gently" of it: their ideal Church is far removed, on the one hand, from the Utopia dreamed of by Anglicanism of this type, and, on the other, from the reality of Rome. Mr. Egerton, it seems, is a High Churchman on whom this has recently dawned. Hence surprise, perplexity, and, finally, protest—the latter taking the shape of an open letter, of over two hundred pages, to Mr. Athelstane Riley, who, more far-seeing than his correspondent, is, or was, of opinion that "we Anglicans are under no obligation to take sides in the Modernist controversy." The opinion is not new. It was acted upon some thousands of years ago by the inhabitants of Meroz, who obtained an unenviable notoriety on that account.

The letter is not easy reading: neither the thought nor the style is clear. It is not always obvious whether it is the author or Father Tyrrell who is speaking; or, if it be the latter, whether he is discussing the standpoint of an opponent or explaining his own. Mr. Egerton shows clearly that Father Tyrrell is not a conservative theologian in the sense in which the word is used by Catholics, Roman or Anglican—this, however, might have been shown in less than two hundred pages—and criticises his distinction between "theological" and "prophetic" truth. His own opinion appears to be that revelation is theological information, not experience subsequently put in theological form; and he seems unaware of the difficulties by which this view of the matter is beset. His criticism is unfruitful, because the premisses on which it is based lead to conclusions which he refrains from drawing. To conceive religion as letter, as something outside the self, is to land oneself, if one reasons consistently, not only in Rome, but in Rome at its most Roman—in the Unam Sanctam, the Definition of 1870, the Encyclical Pascendi, &c. When such conclusions are indicated, wise men revise their premisses: the Rome of Pius X. is the reductio ad absurdum of a theory of religion which is not held only at Rome. In the most memorable of his works the late Auguste Sabatier contrasted the religions of authority with the religion of the Spirit. The halfway house is no more than a temporary shelter; the dividing line is here.

Had Mr. Egerton confined himself to showing that the affinities of Modernism are not with the High Anglicans, he would have done a more useful work. They are not: and in the interests of clear thinking it is desirable that there should be no mistake on this point. That the English Church may play a part in the crisis which has been brought about by Modernism is not impossible: much depends on the insight and courage of her rulers, on their power "to take occasion by the hand." The policy of the Vatican has been at once successful and unsuccessful; the former in appearance and for the moment, the latter in fact and for future time. It has not, it may be said without fear of contradiction, altered a single conviction of a single Modernist. But it has driven the symptoms in. Men like Tyrrell in England, Loisy in France, and Murri in Italy, no longer speak for Catholicism; from the standpoint of the concrete Church, and any other is nebulous, they are effectually discredited and disowned. So far, so good: there is no open opposition; the Papacy has saved its face. On the other hand—because Modernism is not a question of opinion, but of knowing or not knowing the facts—the condemned views are increasingly held by Catholics, and that in a more negative form than would have been the case but for their condemnation. The movement, originally a support, is developing into a solvent of Catholicism, in some cases even of faith. False as it is, the dilemma, All or Nothing, weighs heavily on many spirits: "entre la religion inintelligible et le matérialisme brutal, âme poétique et pure, où serait ta place?" To Englishmen so placed English Christianity should present itself, and be presented, as a third path. It is not its dogmatic and institutional side that will be most congenial to them: they have seen what comes of the over-accentuation of ceremonial and creed. It is probable that the light in which they will regard the English Church is that of a Church which, while frankly taking the Reformation standpoint, and so placing herself on the lines of living and legitimate religious development, has the advantage of having broken less with the past, with historical Christianity, than the more radically reformed Churches. She represents, they may remember, the shape which, under Providence, the Christian idea has taken in this country: perhaps, difficult as it is to realise it in times of controversy, of all forms of religion she divides Englishmen the least. Some of those now in doubt and perplexity came out from her in the past. Perhaps they were mistaken: if so, it is not too late to return. But those, should there be such, who take this homeward path, will return not to a narrow Anglican sect, fighting for political privilege, intent on its rehabilitation of impossible dogmas and the restoration of outworn rites; but to an English Church representing all that is best in English Christianity—"this ancient house of our fathers, with all its faults the best and most tolerant of the Churches of Christendom, and the least opposed to the spirit of the age."

A GREAT STUDY-PLAY.*

Of recent years we have been disinterring several forgotten poets of the nineteenth century, such as George Darley and Thomas Lovell Beddoes; and we have been surprised to find men of such admirable parts overtaken by eclipse. But we have not done with the nineteenth century yet; there still remain some poets, not indeed so obscured as Darley and Beddoes were, but certainly not famed according to their deserts, such poets as Alexander Smith, Sydney Dobell, and Stephen Hawker. They are none of them great poets; yet they are too good to be altogether missed by anyone who is happy enough to have an insatiable thirst for poetry. Of course, this sort of thing always follows a period that has been great in poetry. When astonishment at the paramounts of an age begins to leave the minds of the following generation, it becomes apparent that the gods were not the only persons of that time; there were Titans also. It is not always easy to tell a Titan from a god. What, for instance, are we to make of Charles Wells, the latest nineteenth century poet to emerge into the light? His name has long been famous, chiefly because Rossetti and Mr. Swinburne made much of him, as Browning made much of Beddoes; but his great work, "Joseph and His Brethren," has for the general been lost in profound obscurity until Mr. Frowde's present courageous publication. "Shakespearean" is the epithet that was applied to Wells by men who ought to know what the epithet means; and it has been applied not only to his diction, but to his characterisation. It is a large epithet, certainly; and let us say at once that it is too large for the man. Splendor and force and dignity are in "Joseph and his Brethren"; an admirable plenty of those serious moral reflections so beloved of Dr. Johnson, and, what is more, a wonderful power of visualising in unforgettable fashion those moral reflections, as here:—

> "The Will is but a coward at the heart;—
> Unless 'tis deaf and savage like a beast's,
> Where Conscience wakes the Will sins on its knees."

Further, Wells was acutely aware of the internal beauty of words; and his diction and his thought are matched like canvas and breeze:—

> "Like as the wind doth beautify a sail
> And as a sail becomes the unseen wind."

He was continually inventing phrases that stick like burrs, and he did not scruple to turn a conceit, that device which our modern critical pundits find so sour. He carries us along in that swift, easy manner which only fine poetry can achieve; he is no Phaethon with his team of hot-breathed, difficult passions. All this makes him a most considerable poet; but Shakespearean? Hardly; a line here and there may bring the epithet to our minds, such as these of the sun, "the burnish'd king," going down:—

* "Joseph and His Brethren: A Dramatic Poem." By Charles Wells. With introductions by Algernon Charles Swinburne and Theodore Watts-Dunton. Henry Frowde. 1s. net.

> "A god gigantic habited in gold, > Stepping from off a mount into the sea";

or these:—

> "Oh! you do keep your pity in a cage
> And whip it to a starv'd obedience."

But, to name two things only, two prime qualities which must be present in work if it is to be seriously called Shakespearean, "Joseph and his Brethren" has none of that shadowy immensity of thought, that indefinable grandeur of being, which one continually feels behind the beauty and passion of Shakespeare's verse; nor does Wells ever come anywhere near Shakespeare's miraculous propriety of rhythm. Metre, in fact, is not Wells's great quality. His lines are always correct, and sometimes, not often, charmingly varied in rhythm; but they incline to monotony. Wells, doubtless, had made no great study of prosody, for he was what Mr. Watts-Dunton calls a "vagabond poet," one, that is, who is more interested in life than in poetry. Mr. Watts-Dunton has a high opinion of this kind of writer, whereas to put a man in this category seems to us a very serious charge against him as a poet. A poet, if he is worth the name, finds the writing of poetry as much a part of actual vivid life as going for a tramp and drinking in a public-house may be. This will be trite to some; but the absurd division between poetry and "life" seems to obsess a good many folks nowadays. Can anyone suppose that Wells was not supremely conscious of being alive when he composed this exquisite description of Rachel?—

> "Her full dark eye, whose brightness glisten'd through
> The sable lashes soft as camel-hair;
> Her slanting head curv'd like the maiden moon
> And hung with hair luxuriant as a vine
> And blacker than a storm; her rounded ear
> Turn'd like a shell upon some golden shore;
> Her whispering foot that carried all her weight,
> Nor left its little pressure on the sand;
> Her lips as drowsy poppies, soft and red,
> Gathering a dew from her escaping breath;"

and so on for many lines more, all to the same enchanting tune.

In dealing with a poem of so many and such rare excellences, much must be left unsaid. On the character of Phraxanor, for example, we might let loose a deal of admiration; but we do not know that anything could be added to Mr. Swinburne's eulogy of this subtle, exciting creation—the only character of the poem, as a matter of fact, that is profound as well as vigorous. One thing, however, does seem worth touching upon—the poem's form. It is a drama written merely to be read—the kind of play that Wagner called "the unheard-of." Now, in spite of "Samson Agonistes," "Faust," "Cain," "Prometheus Unbound," "Paracelsus," "Empedocles on Etna," and "Atalanta in Calydon," there are several cautious critics nowadays who protest that the dramatic poem is an unfortunate aberration, an amphibious thing that cannot be justified. This is really no more than an instance of the human being's strange faculty of overlooking the obvious; the obvious here being the printing-press. Drama is a very much larger thing than performances on the stage. The stage, certainly, is a very convenient apparatus for conveying drama, but there is no reason in nature why it should be the only one. Printing caused man to develop his imagination in a new way, and to be as impressionable to the printed word as he was, and, of course, still is, to the stimulation of acted drama. It was very soon found that the new way of conveying drama had possibilities in it which made the study-play a prodigiously valuable acquisition to art. Moreover, is this way so new? Disregarding such early examples as "David and Bethsabe," and jumping into the first great age of drama, was "Prometheus Bound" ever much more than a study-play? And do not some scholars now hold that Euripides wrote several plays primarily for reading? The study-play is a form that gives the dramatist splendid opportunities that no other form can give; and, as Mr. Hardy has shown, these opportunities have not by any means been thoroughly exhausted. It is as an addition to the number of great study-plays that "Joseph and his Brethren" is, we venture to think, chiefly considerable. And as a study-play it will surely now take an honorable place in English literature, and help by its noble example in urging poets to come to expatiate their genius in this magnificent form of poem.

FRASER OF LOVAT.*

Simon Fraser is one of the many men whose reputation has suffered from the human passion for good, clear effects of black and white. His character, indeed, was one which no eulogist could present as angelic. His first public appearances—in the year 1696, when he was about twenty—were connected with the capture and imprisonment of an elderly nobleman, and with the forcible marriage of a dowager baroness; his last public appearance was in 1747, on Tower Hill, where he was executed for high treason. During the intervening years, he had professed and denied more than one form of religion, and more than one allegiance; and his name has come down to us as that of a double-dyed traitor, stained with acts of lawless violence. Mr. Mackenzie's volume, however, shows very clearly that he was by no means the monster of general tradition. A very small change of circumstances might have made him as respectable as most of his contemporaries; and, even as the facts stand, he was not more often betrayer than betrayed.

The course of his whole life was decided by an early injustice, and by wresting from him, for a long period, of the title and position that he eventually attained. Lord Lovat, his cousin, left no male descendant; and left also both a marriage contract that settled estates and honors on his eldest daughter, and a deed, annulling that contract, by which he recognised the father of Simon as his heir. Simon always maintained, and the law, in the end, agreed with him, that the barony of Lovat was a male fief. The widowed Lady Lovat, however, was a Murray of Atholl, and the Murrays not only upheld their niece's claim, but refused to marry her to Simon. Lord Saltoun's son was put forward as a rival, whereupon the father of the proposed bridegroom was captured by Simon and his clansmen, and was held prisoner until he resigned all pretensions. Much indignation and a prospect of punishment naturally followed. Simon, neither penitent nor prudent, next invaded the widow in her castle, and suddenly married her instead of her daughter. What precise degree of compulsion was employed, and what were the real sentiments of her ladyship are matters now beyond elucidation. In any case, it seems clear that Lady Lovat was a person of no great stability of mind, apt to side with any present relative against any absent one. A military expedition was sent to take Simon, his father, and his accomplices, dead or alive, and although that effort and others failed ignominiously, life in Scotland began to grow extremely hazardous for Simon Fraser. He retired to London, and entered upon that system of complicated diplomacy which covered the whole remainder of his life. Like most men of his time, he kept a foot in each camp, and his first visit to the Court of the exiled Stuarts at St. Germain was directly followed by one to King William's Court in Holland. There seems good reason, however, to believe that his sympathies and his convictions were consistently Jacobite, and that he never betrayed to the established English Government any information really damaging to the interests of the older family. But a man who follows the common custom of that period and maintains friendly relations, necessitating a network of lies, with both parties, can hardly escape suspicion; and a day came in which neither the King of France nor the exiled Queen of England would have anything more to do with Simon Fraser. Not till nearly a dozen years afterwards did he seriously attempt to put himself at the service of the English Government. In the '15 he behaved like a loyal—though hardly an enthusiastic—Whig, and he was rewarded with wealth and favors, and shortly afterwards succeeded in marrying Miss Grant of Grant. For many years from this time he lived at home, though not in peace, for he was a man of many law suits. The most remarkable of his cases dealt with the disputed Lovat title, which, in 1730, was adjudged to be his. Not long after this success he was assisting in the abduction of Lord Grange's troublesome wife, who, by her husband's connivance and Fraser's active intervention, was conveyed away to St. Kilda, and long kept captive.

Simon Fraser was now established as Lord Lovat, and

* "Simon Fraser, Lord Lovat: His Life and Times." By W. C. Mackenzie, F.S.A. (Scot.) Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.

as the chief of his clan, a position which was the height of his ambition, and which he filled, in many ways, well. With his second wife, a Campbell, he quarrelled continually, and they parted at the end of five years. But for the descent of Charles Edward upon Scotland, Fraser might have gone down to a Highland grave, a quarrelsome, intriguing, witty, and rather disreputable old gentleman, much and justly loved by his own kin, and considerably regretted by the Whig party. But Charles Edward came. Lovat wavered, protested, wavered again, and finally sent his eldest son to join the Prince. He himself stayed at home, and pretended to the authorities that his clansmen "went out" without orders from him. He was, however, arrested, but escaped, and for the first and last time met "bonnie Prince Charlie" flying from Culloden. For some time he eluded capture, but was finally taken, and conveyed to London. At his trial he was somewhat abject, attempted to move pity by references to his age—which was less than he represented it—and to his infirmities, which were real, and uttered fulsome compliments to "that brave young hero," the odious Duke of Cumberland. But when once condemned he became calm, courageous, and cynically witty, acknowledged himself to be, in fact, a Roman Catholic, and died, in his own words, "as a Highland chieftain should, not in his bed." The biography was well worth writing, not only in justice to its subject, but because Fraser—in himself an interesting and complex personality—forms an excellent example of the moral disintegration brought about by times of political uncertainty. From the departure of James II. to the accession of George III., few public men were consistently true to either political creed. It may be salutary for modern politicians, securely upright, in an established order, to ask themselves whether, in a country hanging balanced between two dynasties, they also might not have been found "hedging" with Fraser and with Marlborough.

TWO NOVELS.*

The two novels before us offer so instructive a contrast in atmosphere and social outlook that an intelligent foreigner might almost doubt whether the characters, respectively the product of a Catholic and of a Protestant land, really belong to the same species. "After the Pardon" is a good example of the literature of passion which, from early days, has swept northwards from Mediterranean lands in successive waves, invading the chilly atmosphere of the Northern peoples. It is curious to reflect how weak and emotionally inexpressive would be our literature of love stories, poems, and plays, had we been cut off, by an impassable barrier, from the South. Chaucer's love tales, with their gracious and joyous atmosphere, are of Mediterranean origin, as are most of the love plots of Shakespeare and of the Elizabethan stage. Even the famous literature of the Minnesingers was a loan from Provence and the Courts of Love, and came into Germany by way of the Alps. In Teutonic, old Scandinavian, and Icelandic literature, it is noticeable that the love motive bears but stunted fruit, whereas the literature of the Celts, who were racially the cosmopolitan chapmen between North and South, is extremely rich in love songs and love sagas. Goethe and Ibsen are good instances of great authors who have turned their faces to the Southern classical lands, and it is of significance that for the word genius we ourselves have had to go South to the shores of the Mediterranean. It is, therefore, with a sense of ancient obligations that we should welcome this work of Matilde Serao, which, with its picture of the intense absorption of the heroine and hero, Maria Guasco and Marco Fiore, in seeking "the flower and fruit of love," strikes strangely into our Northern atmosphere of mental reserve and emotional inexpressiveness. The advantage to the English reader of this serious study of the love passion, with its boundless desires, preying flames, and sequel of bitter ashes, is that he can lose sight entirely of his own prepossessions, and is forced to realise that his sentimental ideals are the special growth of a different soil, climate, and civilisation. In the North, passion is always portrayed as a doubtful force, a temptation, a perilous expenditure of unmeasured energy, and our instinct is to hoard up passion, to nurse it, to make it last a lifetime, so that we may believe in its dignity and strength.

But in the South passion itself is an ideal, a proof of internal force, almost a duty. And beauty is indissolubly connected with the mystery of its emotional raptures and torments, even as the sunlight is indissolubly associated with health. The situation that is unfolded in the opening chapters of "After the Pardon," between Maria Guasco and Marco Fiore, who, after three years of an intense and overmastering mutual passion, reveal to one another, with the bitter tears of humiliation, that their love is dead, that their hearts are barren, that their desires are spent and exhausted, and their passion can know no re-birth, is almost incomprehensible to the quiet English mind. For this death of passion is sorrowed over by them with the same intensity of feeling that with us is awakened in the soul of those who mourn bitterly the death of a beloved child. In the depth of their grief at their inner impotence, their mortal weariness and indifference, since "the lofty outstanding reason of life—love—is ended," the lovers determine to face "the duty of reparation," and Maria Guasco returns to devote herself to her husband, Emilio, to make him forget the sufferings she has inflicted upon him, and Marco Fiore, in turn, is ready to pay for "his intoxication of happiness and liberty" by marrying Vittoria Cusulta, his old betrothed, whom he has betrayed when he left her to flee away with Maria. The husband and the betrothed are indeed ready to pardon those who have sinned against them, because both Emilio and Vittoria are still passionately in love with their betrayers. The return of the lovers to their duty, like the return home of children who have got tired of playing truant, though it has hidden elements of comedy in it to the English mind, almost seems to be building the bridge of reconciliation between the moral ideas of north and south. But the bridge ends abruptly in the air when we perceive that Emilio's and Vittoria's demand is simply for passion also! Neither of them is satisfied with affection, sympathy, or duty, from the returned sinner. "You must love me with passion as you loved Marco, as I love you," cries Emilio to Maria, and this, of course, is out of the power of the repentant and contrite wife who, indeed, had forsaken her husband three years before, simply for the reason that his passion awakened no response in her. And similarly Vittoria does not care a straw for "the affectionate and tender companionship" of Marco. She wants one thing only—to be loved with the same true and intense ardour with which he has loved Maria. "Am I not young? am I not beautiul? am I not his? Don't I adore him?" she says to her great aunt, the Duchess of Altomonte. And the Duchess, while counselling the bride to be satisfied with what she herself has experienced in her marriage, "a strong moral sympathy, a tranquil and secure attachment," reveals in her answer that the national ideal of her countrymen—passion as an end in itself—is what separates north from south. And this is the reason why the greatest genius we have produced was forced to look to Italy for the dramas of "Othello" and "Romeo and Juliet."

Turning to "The Faith of His Fathers," we exchange the slow sweeping line of an art and social outlook born of generations of leisure for the cramped and petty lines of rigid facts in the life of English provincial townsfolk. The dull round of business in factory, shop, and counting-house, the monotony and narrowness of family life, the harsh intolerance of a Methodist training—it is by the pressure of such factors in the life of the Atkinsons, father and son, mother and daughter, that the growth of their spiritual antagonism ends in rupture and collapse. The character of the austere and earnestly self-righteous Mr. Atkinson, who forces his weak and self-indulgent son, Stephen, to marry the barmaid, Flossie, so that he may "atone for his sin and do justice to her and his child," is very well indicated, and not less well so the self-repression of the colorless mother whose bloodless acquiescence in her husband's decisions turns at the end to rankling hate. Miss Jacomb has presented us with so truthful a study, one executed with such sincerity and painstaking talent, that it is a little curious that the total effect is artistically disappointing. Stephen's sullen relations with his vulgar, cheerful wife, Flossie, and his

* "After the Pardon." By Matilde Serao. Eveleigh Nash. 6s.
"The Faith of His Fathers." By A. E. Jacomb. Melrose. 6s.

moral degeneration, inevitable in such an unsuitable union, are painted with much exactitude, and Rachel Atkinson's alienation from her father when he forbids her to marry "the unbeliever," Ransome, whose agnosticism will "imperil her soul," has the force of nature in it. But the grey utilitarian pettiness of the streets and "mean villas" of Chadford is matched by the flatness and tonelessness of the author's style. There is no charm of phrase, no distinctive individuality in her literary instrument. The spiritual beauty of the novel, such as it is, is smothered, too, under the load of unnecessary and trifling details. Miss Jacomb is so promising a recruit to the sparse ranks of our realists in fiction that we gladly own that her conscientious anxiety to be true, at all costs, to the facts of the prosaic environment she depicts, is a fault on the right side. We would urge her to remember, however, that a work of art lives by virtue of its beauty no less than of its truth to nature, and that as a literary model Mark Rutherford is preferable to George Gissing. A novelist's form and style must show grace and beauty, if his chronicle is to live. And few of our modern novelists do not show themselves deficient in æsthetic feeling. Here is exemplified another contrast between north and south; the meagre, thin, colorless pages of Miss Jacomb contrast poorly with the melody and force of Matilde Serao's language even in the very so-so translation supplied to us by the English publisher. It is not fitting, by the way, that a translation should be issued anonymously, as we note is the custom of Mr. Eveleigh Nash. The translator is responsible for the rendering, and his name should always be given as a guarantee that he has done his best.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"Asser's Life of King Alfred" (Chatto & Windus, 1s. 6d. net) is a volume in the Series of "King's Classics," issued under the general editorship of Professor I. Gollancz, Mr. L. C. Jane being responsible for the introduction and notes. The work is a welcome addition to the series; not only because it is the contemporary "Life" of a monarch who still appeals to British popular sentiment as no other Saxon king can, but because it is the basis of most of what we know of Alfred's personal character. It was first printed by Archbishop Parker in 1574 from the author's MS. The latter was destroyed by a fire in the Cottonian Library in 1731, and the present translation is from the "Monumenta Historica Britannica," published in 1848. Many interpolations were introduced into the original text by the Elizabethan archbishop, and one or two subsequent annotators, but these are as far as possible distinguished from the original portions in this edition by being printed in italics; so that one can obtain a very clear idea of what belongs to Asser and what to his editors. The chief importance of these interpolations lies in the fact that they detract from, rather than add to, the strength and wisdom of Alfred. They emphasise the religious side of his character to the point of morbidness, making him appear as "a pale replica of a medieval saint," instead of the strenuous man of action; with the result that, though they include most of the pretty legends—especially that of the Cakes—which it would be pleasant to continue to believe, they are of little value as history. Asser's text is, moreover, sufficiently exaggerated in respect of the King's virtues, though this failing may be due, as Mr. Jane suggests, to his purpose in compiling the Life. It was intended mainly for Welsh readers, the monkish author himself being a Welshman; and its aim was to present the Wessex king in as favorable a light as possible, in order to break down the alliance between the Welsh and the Danes, and to further the cause of a Christian combination, under the Wessex king, against the pagans. As propagandist literature on behalf of the unification of the kingdom, the "Life" was probably less effective than it might have been, owing to its confused arrangement and its many parentheses. But as a contemporary document it remains of the highest political and personal importance. Of Asser's own career and personality the details are somewhat shadowy. It is, however, probable that he was Bishop of St. David's when he first entered the King's service, and afterwards became the recipient of the Sherborne bishopric and other ecclesiastical benefices, the while he supervised his royal patron's literary education.

* * *

Professor Percival Lowell some years ago startled the scientific world by the confidence with which he put forward a theory that Mars is inhabited by beings not very different from ourselves. In "Mars as the Abode of Life" (Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net) he amplifies this theory, supports it by further arguments, and gives us a picture of the Martians and the conditions under which they live. According to Professor Lowell, the Martians have reached a high state of civilisation, war has been abolished, for the system of irrigation, upon which life in the planet depends, would be destroyed if one nation interfered with the canals which carry water to its neighbors. All the natural conditions are so hostile that the Martians must be beings of extraordinary intellectual development. The oceans have long since dried up, the land is flat and desolate, "five-eighths of its surface are an arid waste, pitilessly held up to a brazen sun, unprotected by any shield of shade, unrelieved from sterility by surface moisture or covering of cloud." "To conceive of this great buckler of brazen sand and rock, level as a polished shield, and stretching to the far distance, to stand sharp-cut there by the horizon of a sky, unrelieved by so much as a mountain-notching of its blue, is to realise in part what life on it must mean." The picture is far from alluring, though if Professor Lowell is to be credited, a very similar state of affairs will yet be seen upon the earth. It is doubtful whether the view that there are sentient beings upon Mars will ever command assent from men of science, and Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace has stated the opposite opinion with much force. But the interest of Professor Lowell's book for the ordinary reader is rather the stimulus it gives to the imagination than its scientific theories. From this point of view it is most successful. As we follow Professor Lowell's account we care little for the fact that it is mainly based on but two indisputable facts—the discovery by spectrum analysis that there is water on Mars, and the proof of the real existence of the "canals" afforded by modern photography. Professor Lowell writes in a racy style, and his book is enlivened by many controversial hits at his opponents.

* * *

Mr. W. B. Woodgate is a sportsman pur sang, and his "Reminiscences of an Old Sportsman" (Nash, 15s. net) will prove entertaining reading to all for whom athletics and racing are of special interest. Educated at Radley and Brasenose, a member of the Oxford winning eights of 1862 and 1863, the founder of Vincent's Club, and in later years exercising a powerful influence upon University sport both directly and from his contributions to journalism, Mr. Woodgate has much to say that is well worth reading. He relates, for instance, how it was that dark blue came to be the recognised color for all Oxford athletic teams. It was in the Whitsun term of 1862 that the Oxford University Cricket Club first applied to the University Boat Club for leave to wear dark blue at Lord's. Up to that time the color had been a monopoly of the University eight, the eleven appearing in the colors of the different clubs to which its members belonged. Three of the five members of the Boat Club Committee were opposed to the proposal, but when a vote was taken one of the dissentients was absent attending the funeral of a relative. The President, whom the cricketers had complimented by electing him a Harlequin, gave his casting vote in favor of allowing the privilege, subject to two conditions. First, the ribbon was to be worn only on variegated straw, not white; and, secondly, the cricketers were forbidden to bind their blue coats with blue silk trimming. Since that eventful decision many minor branches of sport have adopted dark or light blue, and the color is now, of course, representative of all Inter-University competitions. The book is full of amusing anecdotes and will appeal with special force to old Oxonians.

* * *

"Dutch Painting in the Nineteenth Century," by M. G. Hermine Marius, which has been rendered into English by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos (Alexander Moring, 15s. net), covers a much wider field than did Dr. Max

Two Notable Books JUST OUT.

1. THE SHORT CUT TO INDIA.

The Record of a Journey along the Route of the Baghdad Railway.

By DAVID FRASER. Author of "A Modern Campaign" and the "Marches of Hindustan."

With 83 Illustrations and Maps. 12/6 net.

This is a book of adventurous travel; it is also a book of Political Importance. Mr. Fraser made the journey from Constantinople to Bombay over the route of the projected Baghdad Railway; and when travelling in the desert of Mesopotamia on Christmas Day, 1903, was attacked and dangerously wounded by an Arab robber. Besides the record of these and similar adventures, his book contains an exhaustive study of many interesting aspects of the Baghdad Railway Question, and includes in an Appendix the hitherto unpublished papers relating to the famous Convention of 1903.

2. THE NEW JUNE.

By HENRY NEWBOLT. Author of "Admirals All," etc. 6s.

The term, "Historical Romance," is apt in these days to suggest dull research in dingy libraries. "THE NEW JUNE," by the author of "ADMIRALS ALL," is a Romance of History as sparkling and sweet as is its title. In this story of the times of Richard II., we are in a live world of gallant knights and winning ladies, in camp and tournay, among blowing woods and murmuring streams. Mr. Newbolt claims that he is on the side of humanity against archæology. The past, as he says, is for him no box of puppets but a world of living men and women, with secrets for him to puzzle out.

Readers of "THE NEW JUNE" will discover how well Mr. Newbolt fulfills his claim.

W. BLACKWOOD & SONS: Edinburgh & London.

BOOKS OF LIBERAL RELIGION.

PEOPLE'S EDITIONS.

6d. each net. By Post, 8d.

The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles for English Readers. A Translation with Introduction and Notes by J. E. Odgers, M.A., D.D.

The Bible: What it is and is Not. By Joseph Wood.

Endeavours after the Christian Life. First and Second Series. Two Vols. By James Martineau, LL.D., D.C.L., D.D.

The Perfect Life: Twelve Discourses. By William Ellery Channing, D.D.

God and the Soul: Essay on Fundamental Religion. By Richard A. Armstrong, B.A.

The Passing and the Permanent in Religion. By Minot J. Savage, D.D.

The First Three Gospels: Their Origin and Relations. With a new Chapter on the Historical Value of the Gospels. By J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., D.D., D. Litt.

The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in its Relation to Modern Thought. By Charles Beard, B.A., LL.D.

The Soul: Its Sorrows and its Aspirations. By Francis W. Newman. Memoir and Introduction by C. B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc.

Materialism and Atheism Examined. By James Freeman Clarke, D.D. With an Introduction by Sydney H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc.

The Religious Ideas. By the late William Johnson Fox, M.P. With a Brief Sketch of his Life.

London: PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

Booksellers supplied by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd.

The March BOOK MONTHLY, 6d. net,

IS NOW READY.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. Gossip of the Hour about Authors and Books, with good pictures to look at.

THE LITERARY GAME. As Played by a Young Australian in London.—By Albert Dorrington.

A SPANISH MAIN. South America as a New Market for English Books.—By Percy F. Martin, F.R.G.S.

A LONDON LETTER. With a Second Edition of a Book Symposium.—By the Editor.

A POET WELLS. And the Strange Story of a Forgotten Poem.

LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of February.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

Publishers: Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd., 4, Stationers' Hall Court, London, E.C.

Mr. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

GEORGE CANNING AND HIS FRIENDS.

Containing hitherto Unpublished letters, Jeux d'Esprit, &c. Edited by Captain JOSCELINE BAGOT. With portraits. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 30s. net.

". . . carefully and completely edited by Captain Bagot . . . a contribution of first-rate importance to the history of England and Europe."—The Manchester Guardian.

". . . their value may be adjudged when we say that no man will in future be able to discuss authoritatively the period with which they deal unless he has at least glanced through them. Their contents must make them a political classic; and they are well and unobtrusively edited. The editor is exactly what an editor should be."—The Globe.

THE LIFE OF ADMIRAL SIR LEOPOLD McCLINTOCK,

The Great Arctic Explorer and Discoverer of the Fate of Franklin. By Sir CLEMENTS MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"The book is written with a sailor-like simplicity which well becomes its subject. . . . McClintock was a man of valour of whom any country would be justly proud, and it is a heartsome thing to read a work in which his brave deeds are so fitly told."
—Scotsman.

GENTLEMEN ERRANT.

The Travels and Adventures of Four Noblemen in Europe in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries. By Mrs. HENRY CUST. With Maps and Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.
Ready next week

This book narrates in a picturesque style the travels, adventures, and manners of four gentlemen who wandered over the world in search of anything they could find which was worth the having; wives, wealth, politics, and war attracted all of them, and, touching life at every point, their records give a lively and first-hand picture of the times they lived in. The notes are drawn from authoritative sources, many of which are quoted for the first time. The volume, while entertaining in itself, possesses serious historical value.

DOURIS AND THE PAINTERS OF GREEK VASES.

Translated from the French of EDMOND POTTIER, of the Musée de Louvre, Paris, by BETTINA KAHNWEILER. With a Preface by JANE ELLEN HARRISON, of Newnham College, Cambridge. With Coloured and other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVES:

Their Present Condition and Progress. Edited by the SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE RACES COMMITTEE. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

"The volume is well packed with statistics, and rests its arguments upon facts, and facts alone, while at the same time it displays a wide faculty for forecasting future developments, and a refreshingly calm and judicial demeanour in the face of boding difficulties."
—Daily Telegraph.

HYDROGRAPHICAL SURVEYING.

Description of the Means and Methods Employed in Constructing Marine Charts. By the late Rear-Admiral Sir W. J. L. WHARTON, K.C.B. A New Edition, Revised and Enlarged by Rear-Admiral MOSTYN FIELD, F.R.S., Hydrographer to the Admiralty. With Diagrams and Illustrations, medium 8vo, 21s. net.

NEW VOLUME IN THE PROGRESSIVE SCIENCE SERIES.

THE INTERPRETATION OF RADIUM.

By FREDERICK SODDY, Lecturer in Physical Chemistry in the University of Glasgow. With Diagrams. Illustrated. 6s. net.

W. J. LOCKE'S NEW NOVEL.

SEPTIMUS.

By the Author of "The Beloved Vagabond." Fourth Impression. 6s.

Truth says: "If you want a perfectly delightful book, get W. J. Locke's 'Septimus.'"

MISS ESPERANCE AND MR. WYCHERLY.

By Mrs. L. ALLEN HARKER. Fourth Impression. 6s.

The Lady says: "The most delightful book of its kind we have ever read. A story of the 'Cranford' type, as gracefully written, as full of tender humour, as Mrs. Gaskell's masterpiece, and even more endearing. . . . Everyone who is capable of appreciating true literature will read it with sympathetic tears and laughter, and return to it lovingly as one meets and greets tried and faithful friends."

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

Rooses' volume on the same subject, issued in 1900. Whereas the latter dealt only with the prominent artists of the Hague group and a few others intimately connected therewith, M. Marius is far more comprehensive in his treatment of modern Dutch painting as a whole. The first part of the volume is devoted to a sketch of the artistic developments that followed the seventeenth century in Holland. These, put briefly, were as follows. During the eighteenth century the demand, as in most other countries, was for decorative painting and applied art, such as tapestry, although a good deal of encouragement of a sort was also given to portraiture. But, thanks very largely to the uncertain political state of the country, nothing very great was produced even in these two directions, while in others the native pictorial genius languished through neglect; and at the end of the century, when the English school was declaring its existence to the world and the French had begun to recover from the shock of the Revolution, no Dutch painters of eminence had appeared. The craze for history painting which infected the Netherlands as well as other states, combined with a similarly widespread devotion to "Italian culture," gave Holland a moderate artist only in the elder Pieneman, and the Romanticism that followed produced nobody better than Ary Scheffer, the talented sentimentalist whose popularity in this country was at that time only less pronounced than in his own. Indeed, until the Hague school becomes a reality with the advent of Josef Israels to that city in 1869, there is little to be said about Dutch nineteenth century art. Then, however, in the painting of Israels himself, Anton Mauve, the three Marises, Weissenbruch, Bosboom, and several more who, like Theophile de Bock, were "minor" artists in a comparative sense alone, there was a famous revival of the Dutch genius for landscape and genre. The Hague school retains a good deal of its influence at the present time, despite the fact that latter-day Dutch artists tend to become more continental and less Dutch, and that as early as 1880 a section of the Amsterdam school definitely revolted against the impressionistic developments of the earlier movement, and declared for a more linear and more classical style. This profusely illustrated volume is really informative in regard to Dutch art since Rembrandt, and the translation is adequate on the whole. There are, however, one or two rather ludicrous mistakes or misprints which should be corrected if it is found worth while to issue another edition.

* * *

The "Fortnightly" is an unusually good and interesting number. Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace writes charmingly to illustrate what he calls the "universality of variation," and his argument, drawn largely from Mr. J. A. Allen's researches into variation in birds, shows how absurd was the late Lord Salisbury's dictum that the doctrine of natural selection based itself on the law of chances—a lottery in which the odds were heavy against an improvement of type. Mr. Atherley Jones, discussing the Labor Party in Parliament, points out what we think is clearly the true moral of the decision in "Osborne versus the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants," namely, that payment of members by the State must take the place of payment of members by Trade Unions or bodies of laborers. Dr. Rappoport's sketch of the Russian political and secret police is thoroughly illuminating, and excellent, too, is Mr. Thayer's contrasted sketch of Cavour and Bismarck, the typical Liberal and the typical reactionary Continental statesman of the last century. Mr. Archibald Hurd, while deprecating the demand for more ships for the fleet, asks for more men, in this respect contradicting Lord Brassey, who thinks the personnel of our fleet excessive. The special feature of the number, however, is the first instalment of Count Tolstoy's "The Law of Force and the Law of Love," which, while it contains nothing new to students of Tolstoy, exhibits also the whole truth about the moral situation of the Christian world of to-day.

* * *

In "The Nineteenth Century and After," Professor Vambéry speculates upon "The Future of Constitutional Turkey," and warns Europeans against taking a too optimistic view of the future. He points to the great financial stress and want of means for the introduction of reforms, the struggle which is sure to ensue for greater freedom for Moslem women, the necessity of developing fresh political and educational machinery, and the heterogeneous national elements that compose Turkey's Asiatic possessions. "Turkey will need at least two decades to accomplish the transformation which Europe looks for at the hands of Young Turkeydom. Absolute peace and quietness are, of course, a first necessity for bringing the work of reform to a satisfactory conclusion; and, since the peace and quietness of the Near East depend mainly on the attitude of the European Powers, the success or the failure of the Constitutional movement in Turkey rests in reality with our European Cabinets." Lieutenant-Colonel C. F. Massy, a former Commissioner in the Punjab, gives his impressions of a recent visit to India. He takes the official view of the present situation, though he admits that "things are perfectly quiet on the surface all over India, with the exception of the Bengal provinces." Organised anarchism does not exist outside Bengal, and the extremists are a quantité negligeable. Nevertheless, Colonel Massy advises that the "recent special repressive Acts" should be "promptly extended to any tract in which disloyalty shows itself active." Dr. Archibald Fleming discusses "Scottish Orders and Catholic Reunion"; Lady Frederick Cavendish suggests that the Education Problem may be solved by allowing each district to decide for ten years, by a popular vote, upon the character of the religious teaching to be given. Mrs. John Richard Green, in "Tradition versus Enquiry in Irish History," brilliantly answers Mrs. Dunlop's criticisms, made in the last number of the "Quarterly Review." Mrs. Green shows that with the advance of modern studies, need has arisen to review the whole of the materials for Irish history, and to revise the old conclusions. She answers Mrs. Dunlop's criticisms in detail, and leaves the reader with the distinct feeling that she has the better of the argument. Some personal reminiscences of Edward Fitzgerald, by his great-niece, add to the interest of the number.

* * *

"The Contemporary Review" opens with an article on "Ministers and their Critics," by Mr. E. T. Cook, in which it is contended, though not in an ardent or very convincing fashion, that it is possible to treat the veto of the House of Lords as "the dominating issue," and yet pass Bills through the Commons as if it had no existence. Mr. Ernest Rhys writes in pleasant style upon "M. Anatole Le Braz and the Awakening of Brittany." The Celtic revival has made remarkable progress in Brittany, though there, as in Ireland, the clerical influence is in the main hostile. Miss Winifred Stephens discusses the contributions of M. Anatole France and Mr. Andrew Lang to the biography of Joan of Arc. Mr. Jack London describes the leper settlement of Molokai, which he has lately visited, pointing out that "the horrors of Molokai, as they have been painted in the past, do not exist." What Mr. London saw was "a happy colony, divided into two villages and numerous country and seaside homes, of nearly a thousand souls." There are several assembly halls, a band stand, a race track, baseball grounds, shooting ranges, an athletic club, numerous glee clubs, and two brass bands. Miss Edith Sellers continues her account of "Poor Relief in Switzerland," an interesting section of her article dealing with the penal colony of Witzvil which, it is claimed, brings about a permanent improvement in one-third of the cases sent there. Other articles of interest are Mr. G. K. Gokhale's on "Constitutional Reforms in India," Mr. W. S. Urquhart's on "The Pessimistic Tendency of Pantheism," and Madame Caroline R. de Havilland's "Recollections of Victor Hugo."

* * *

The March number of "The English Review" contains the last instalment of Mr. Wells's novel, "Tono-Bungay." We have reviewed this book in a former issue. Mr. Joseph Conrad continues his "Reminiscences," and Mr. Belloc contributes an article on "The Source of Information," part of which has been blocked out by the editor as containing matter which is libellous, though true. What is left of the article is scarcely epoch-making. Mr. Henry James has written a short story fashioned with his accustomed delicacy of workmanship, and there are poems by M. Emile Verhaeren and Miss Ethel Clifford.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

THE POOR LAW COMMISSION

THE MINORITY REPORT.

THE BREAK-UP of the POOR LAW being

Part I. of the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission.

Edited, with Introduction, by SIDNEY and BEATRICE WEBB
8vo, pp. xx and 604, 7s. 6d. net. (Inland postage 6d.)

The Volume concludes with a Scheme of Reform, of novel and far-reaching character, which is elaborately worked out in detail, involving the abolition of the workhouse and the complete disappearance of the Poor Law.

THE PUBLIC ORGANIZATION OF THE LABOUR MARKET being

Part II. of the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission.

Edited, with Introduction, by SIDNEY and BEATRICE WEBB
8vo, pp. xvi and 348, 5s. net. (Inland postage 4d.)

The final chapter on Proposals for Reform gives, in elaborate detail, the Minority's plan for solving the whole problem of Unemployment.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO, 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

The Daily News

is now printed simultaneously in London and Manchester.

This means that Liberals all England over are able to get the representative Liberal organ every morning at the same time as their local daily.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

London Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.
Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.,

CATALOGUES POST FREE.

Have the Largest Selection of Bibles, Prayer Books, and Church Services. Publishers of "The Marked Bible," "Lectern Lesson Book," "Priest's Pocket Bible," "Daily Service Book," &c.

CASH DISCOUNT, 3D. IN 1S.

☛ Thousands of Bibles, etc., at HALF-PRICE.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning. Feb. 26.	Price Friday morning, March 5.
Consols 2½ per cent.	84 ...	83⅞
German 3 per cent.	86 ...	86
U.S. Steel Pref.	110¾ ...	113½
Union Pacific	176⅛ ...	179⅓
New York Central	125½ ...	127¼

Week in the City.

The markets of the Stock Exchange during the week have been dominated by alternating hopes and fears in regard to Servia and Montenegro. American railways and industrials have been inactive, awaiting the Presidential address, which was eventually received by Wall Street with equanimity. Trade is very sluggish, the high price of corn being an adverse factor. Nor can much be expected from the United States until the new tariff has been settled. Gold in the shape of American Eagles is being shipped from Paris to London, and the Bank reserve is still rising steadily. So the prospect is for a run of very cheap money after March.

The Low Price of Silver.

All the metals except gold have been depressed for more than a year, and though silver has not fallen so much as copper, it has gone low enough to stir up the silverites to fresh exertions. Senator Teller has led the campaign in the United States; but no one pays much attention there to his argument that silver standard countries, by getting their labor cheaper, will be enabled to cut out countries with a gold standard. The fact is, of course, that low-paid labor is not usually cheap labor. In Mexico City the Chamber of Mines has formed a committee "to take steps calculated to relieve the prostration which the silver mining industry has encountered." The chairman declares that he has no idea of tampering with the Mexican currency laws, though they have been very bad for silver. A Mexican newspaper just received states that the condition of the silver mines in Mexico has been bad for nearly two years. Two or three months ago when the price of silver hovered around the 42-cent mark all of the mines were obliged to shut down wholly or partially, except those which had rich ore. "Many letters have been received of late from mining men from all over the country asking the chamber to try to do something to relieve their situation. They have found some relief in the past ten days when silver rose to 50 and 51 cents, but it is felt that something might be done to sustain the price of the white metal." The German silver interests in alliance with the Agrarians are also active to get the Government to coin more silver.

The Meaning of Money.

Messrs. Smith Elder have just published a book entitled "The Meaning of Money," which may be heartily recommended to all who wish to have an acquaintance with a complex but highly interesting subject. The real purpose of the book is to explain the organisation and machinery of credit with special reference to the London Money Market. The author, Mr. Hartley Withers, has for some time been City editor of the "Times," and has acquired in that capacity a first-hand knowledge of what he writes about, and to a certain extent the book is a reflection of the market and of the opinions of the bankers, brokers, discounters, and dealers in money and exchange with whom it is the business of a City editor to consort. Anxiety about the sufficiency of our gold reserves, which afflicts most of them, is shared by the author, who in all other respects, however, takes a scientific as well as an empirical interest in the monetary problem. The book deserves to be placed by the side of Bagehot's "Lombard Street," to which, indeed, it forms an admirable supplement. Since Bagehot's day many changes have taken place; but the developments have been quite normal. It is satisfactory, for example, to learn that whereas in Bagehot's time the loanable capital at the disposal of borrowers for discounts and short loans was usually insufficient, it is now usually more than sufficient, though the aggregate demand is, of course, now much greater than it then was. Perhaps the most important contribution made by the treatise to our general stock of scientific knowledge is Mr. Withers' demonstration that most of the deposits shown in our banking accounts are loaned by the banks to customers who have usually deposited securities. This fact makes it extremely important that bankers should insist upon ample margins; for otherwise a panic on the Stock Exchange might result in disaster to some of the great credit institutions. Another instructive passage in the book relates to bills of exchange, and there are some remarks upon "Kites," or finance bills, which deserve attention.

Battleships and Sinking Funds.

The Wall Street Journal, of New York City, is not exactly an organ of the Peace Society; but it has a pretty good notion of finance and of the things upon which national credit depends. Ten days ago its editor, after speaking of "the financial straits of a number of European governments, most of them facing deficits, which must be met by new taxation" went on to say:—"The proposals of the British Government in this respect are awaited with a good deal of anxiety, especially as there is no truth in the rumors of any real movement to limit armaments. Of course, if people like battleships and big battalions, they must pay the price, and these are doubtless very expensive toys, with great intrinsic possibilities for mischief. War fever, however, is a curious phenomenon, and England is actually going through a period of great enthusiasm for military development in a time of profound peace. It would be more to the point if the British Government, instead of spending money that way, were buying consols for the sinking fund." But will our Liberal Government find it quite so easy to raise the taxes as to raise the estimates? Anyhow, it is a bad look-out for Consols.

How to Invest.

A useful series of articles on this subject is appearing just now in the Investors' Monthly Manual. The first was chiefly concerned with warning investors against all forms of bucket shops, and especially against those insidious letters one gets by post from kindly agencies which offer out of pure benevolence to look over your list of investments and help you to realise a much higher income. The favorite dodge just now is to advocate a scientific "geographical" distribution of investments. The innocent victim then surrenders his securities, and another set is bought for him. He will find that many of these are not quoted on the London Stock Exchange, and will not realise at anything like the price which the bucket shop has charged him. The first thing for an investor to learn is either to buy direct (by subscribing to a new loan), or to act through a respectable Stock Exchange broker. Brokers are not always good advisers, and if they are asked to recommend speculative stocks "likely to go up," they are often very bad advisers. The second article of the series (which appears in the last number of the Manual) discusses the problem of security and the rival merits of Government loans and industrial debentures. Personally I am inclined towards securities which have the guarantee of a respectable Government behind them. It is a wonderful thing that some English railway debentures yield a lower interest than Prussian Consols.

Lucellum.

EVANS' ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES
are without an equal for keeping the voice and throat in perfect condition for all vocal exercise. Many eminent Preachers, Public Speakers, and Singers praise them in the highest terms for relieving hoarseness and soreness of the Throat. They are also invaluable for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, and other throat and chest affections.
Made to a Formula of the Liverpool Throat Hospital
Can be obtained at all Chemists and Stores at 1s. and 4s. 6d. per box. Write for Free Sample and Illustrated brochure of testimonials received, enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage, to Sole Manufacturers—
EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB LTD., Hanover St., Liverpool.
"TO STRENGTHEN AND IMPROVE THE VOICE"
EVANS' ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES
Ask for "Evans" Pastilles and see you get them.
Beware of the numerous imitations.

TANGYE
OIL ENGINE
AUTOMATIC
TUBE IGNITION.
NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING
TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

If you suffer from Liver Complaints

Merit's Liverets will promptly cure you
Prepared, as prescribed by a prominent Physician from purely vegetable ingredients.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

combine both curative and tonic properties, and are especially compounded to avoid that debilitating effect which the majority of Liver medicines produce. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists or direct from MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name, Merit's Liverets, and the signature, Merit & Co. is on the package.
Spurious imitations are useless.

will promptly cure you

TOURS.

The R.M.S. DUNOTTAR CASTLE (of the Union-Castle Line) is chartered for a series of cruises as follows :—

£21 0s. 0d. The Isles of Greece, Athens, Troy, and Smyrna April 8th.

£14 14s. 0d. PALERMO, Tunis, Algiers, Gibraltar, Tangier Lisbon, April 28th.

Full particulars from Dr. H. S. LUNN, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE RED WHITE
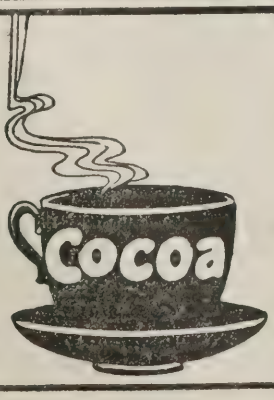
& BLUE
Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

MISCELLANEOUS.

COATS OF ARMS and PEDIGREES.—The Author of "A List of Emigrant Ministers to America" will send free to any interested a circular on the legal right to arms.—GERALD FOTHERGILL, 11, Brussels-road, New Wandsworth.

Curio Club
Bargains
Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.



MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING
Rowntree's
"Warms and Cheers"
Try it!—
"One taste is worth a chapter of talk."

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.

A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN MARCH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.

Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation, 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

In the South of Cheshire, four miles from Crewe. Opened 1900. Modern Buildings with 24 acres of grounds. A Preparatory School in immediate connection with the Present School will be opened in May. Next Entrance Examination for both Schools, April 2nd, at the School. Application should be made to the HEADMASTER, or to the CLERK TO THE GOVERNORS, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT

(THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL).

Entrance Scholarship Examination, March 24th and following days. Apply Headmaster, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

EDUCATIONAL.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698 "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauser Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BREVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.
Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.
Nice—Galignani's Library.
Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.
Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.
Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh
STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor
MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro, Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager
ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station
NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment
ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647
HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for HOUGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 056. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE EUSTON
Close to King's Cross and St. Pancras Stations.
THE UNIVERSITY
HOTEL
ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, Gordon Square
LONDON

Close proximity to Tube Station for all parts of London. Beautifully Furnished by MAPLE. Comforts and Food Equal to anywhere in London, but prices strictly moderate. Sanitation perfect. Fireproof Floors. Lifts, Baths every floor. Lounge, Billiards. Spacious Dining Room. Write Manager for illustrated Tariff Booklet.

BEDROOM inclusive of Breakfast, Lights, and attendance, from 5/-

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.
THACKERAY HOTEL
Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.
KINGSLEY HOTEL
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/6.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day
PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.
NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate
SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager
ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day
HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.
MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

SOME R.T.S. NEW BOOKS.

A New and Important Missionary Biography. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

The Life of George Grenfell,

CONGO MISSIONARY AND EXPLORER. By the REV. GEORGE HAWKER. With Photogravure Portrait, Maps, and 32 full pages of illustrations. The achievements of GEORGE GRENFELL as explorer and geographer have been scientifically treated by Sir Harry Johnston. Mr. Hawker has given the life story of a man who was first of all a missionary.

The 400th Anniversary of the Birth of Calvin. Just Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

John Calvin: The Man and His Work.

By the REV. C. H. IRWIN, M.A. With Portraits and numerous other Illustrations.

The Times says: "Mr. Irwin tells his story tersely and instructively."
The Glasgow Herald says: "It is a handy, simple, and well-indexed account of the Reformer, his system, and his general influence."
Dr. Alexander Whyte says: "This is a compact, popular, and every way capital life."
The British Weekly says: "It is an admirable short biography."
The Daily Chronicle says: "Mr. Irwin's Calvin is popular in style and well informed in all its facts."

A fascinating book after the style of "The Chronicles of the Schonberg-Cotta Family."

The Last Days of John Hus.

A HISTORICAL ROMANCE. Translated from the Original Czech. With an Introduction by W. R. MORFILL, Professor of Slavonic Languages in the University of Oxford. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s.6d. With 24 Illustrations by the eminent painter, JAN DEDINA.

This book is illustrated by pictures of remarkable interest. Never before has such a graphic account of the Council of Constance, and the trial, condemnation, and death of Hus been given to English readers.

New Work by Rev. Dr. Horton. Small crown 8vo, 1s. net.

The Triumphs of the Cross.

BRIEF COUNSELS ON FAITH AND DUTY. By ROBERT F. HORTON, D.D.
This little book purports to be a pocket-book which a man may carry with him, as a soldier carries his Red-book, for frequent reference.

"In Remembrance of Me."

AN ANSWER TO THE EUCHARISTIC CONGRESS OF SEPTEMBER, 1908. By the REV. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A. F'cap 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s.

Contents—(1) "The Real Presence"; (2) "The Nature of the Gift"; (3) "Faith Indispensable"; (4) "Is the Lord's Table an Altar?

NEW EDITIONS.

Foxe's Book of Martyrs.

AN EDITION FOR THE PEOPLE. Prepared by W. GRINTON BERRY, M.A. Large crown 8vo, cloth. With 7 Illustrations printed in Colours, 2s.

James Gilmour of Mongolia.

HIS DIARIES, LETTERS, AND REPORTS. Edited and Arranged by RICHARD LOVETT, M.A. New and Improved Edition. With 3 Coloured and several other Illustrations. ("Great Men Series," No. 5). Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

Uniform with "Sketches of Jewish Social Life."

The Temple: Its Ministry and Services in the Time of Christ.

By the REV. DR. ALFRED EDERSHEIM. Cheap Edition. Large crown 8vo, in attractive binding, cloth gilt, 2s.
"The author knows the varied topics he discusses better than most scholars in England. There are few who will not learn from a volume which has the results with little of the show of learning."—Athenæum.

Ian Maclaren's "St. Jude's."

New Popular Edition. 288 pages, crown 8vo, in cloth. Price 1s. net.

"In literary power, 'St. Jude's' is equal to the best of Dr. Watson's writings." —British Weekly.
"There are lights and shadows, tragedy and comedy, numerous fine touches in this volume, and a deal of the pathos which abounded in the Dramtochty stories."—Glasgow News.
"There is a delicate garnishing of humour."—The Glasgow Herald.

Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Amy Le Feuvre's "The Making of a Woman"

Author of "Probable Sons," "Odd," "A Bit of Rough Road," &c. New Edition. With 4 Illustrations by VICTOR PROUT.
"The Making of a Woman" is an intensely interesting love story possessing that charm of style, that depth of tenderness and that happy characterisation which are naturally associated with MISS LE FEUVRE'S work.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, Bouverie Street, E.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. IV., No. 24.] SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Diary of the Week ...	877
Politics and Affairs:—
The Dominant Issue Again...	880
Coquetting with Conscription	881
A Sermon in Stones	882
The Stalemate of Continental Socialism	884
The Lesson of the Scottish Elections. By One Who Knows	885
Life and Letters:—
The Danger of Eugenics ...	886
The Irish Song	888
A Rebel	889
The "Yes" of Jesus	890
Contemporaries:—
Mr. Taft	891
The Drama:—
Mr. Galsworthy arrives. By William Archer	892
Short Sketch:—
The Parent and Child of To-day. By Mrs. John Lane...	893
Letters to the Editor:—
Conscription. By Colonel A. Grimshaw-Haywood, Commander Herbert M. Wyatt, R.N., and Charles Cecil ...	895
The Strength of the Fleet. By Archibald S. Hurd ...	896
The Policy of the Navy League. By Captain Wm. Caius Crutchley	897
The University of London Commission. By Interested and a Liberal Graduate ...	897
Adult Suffrage. By A. J. Marriott	898
Our Foreign Investments. By G. Eckhard	898
The Inversion of Sentences. By M. D....	898
Wind Flowers. By G. H. Isaacs	898
Consumption. By Dr. J. Fletcher Little	899
A Defect in the Death Duties. By Sidney P. Turnbull ...	899
Votes for Some Women. By Mrs. F. Travers	899
The Marshals of Napoleon. By Percy Cross Standing ...	899
Poetry:—
A Lodge in the Wilderness. By Lucy Lyttelton	899
The World of Books ...	900
Books to be Read	900
Reviews:—
The Revolution as a Royalist saw it	901
The Philosophy of Vitalism...	902
A Poetic Comedy	903
The Artistic Pose	903
Books in Brief:—
The Wander Years	906
The Public Health Agitation, 1833-48	906
A Parson in the Australian Bush	906
Working Lads' Clubs	906
The Week in the City ...	912

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Indian Councils Bill passed its third reading in the House of Lords on Thursday, shorn of Clause 3, which gives the Government of India the power to surround Lieutenant-Governors of Provinces with Executive Councils similar to those which exist in Bombay and Madras. On the motion of Lord MacDonnell this clause was struck out of the Bill, by 59 to 18. Lord Lansdowne, and Lord Curzon, who has been vehement in opposition to a policy which modifies his own autocratic methods, asked for further authorities in support. Lord Morley replied to this on Tuesday by quoting a strong memorandum from the Government of India, affirming their agreement with the Secretary of State, and deprecating the action of the Peers, This communication was of no effect. Lord Lansdowne curtly refused to reinstate the clause. On the motion for third reading, Lord Morley again quoted the favorable opinion of the Viceroy, declared that the resources of civilisation were not exhausted, and intimated plainly that he adhered to the clause, and that the Commons would reinstate it. He denied that the Bill had been framed on the demands of Indian politicians, but admitted and properly defended consultation with Mr. Gokhale and with Mohammedan leaders. Lord Ripon, the father of Indian reform, compared the difficulty of governing India with a democratic movement to Sir Robert Peel's statement of the task of carrying on government with an ancient monarchy, a proud aristocracy, and a reformed House of Commons, and suggested that the same solution applied to the twin problems. In both countries, it appears that the "proud aristocracy" is the chief obstacle to success.

* * *

The series of Scottish elections ended, satisfactorily for Liberalism, on Friday with the election of Sir John Barran for Hawick by a majority of 520. The election was fought avowedly on Protection, and the Tory candidate was one of the ablest protagonists and the best platform representatives of his creed, while Sir John Barran was a stranger to the constituency. Yet he maintained with trifling loss the strength secured by Lord Shaw, the most popular Radical candidate in Scotland, in the greatest year of victory that Liberalism has ever known. The "Morning Post" admits that the Protectionist party cannot view with satisfaction "the strong position which the Liberal cause still holds north of the Tweed." If Scotland and Wales stand firm, and the North of England and the counties adhere to Free Trade, where is the talked-of Tory majority to come from?

* * *

The Army Estimates passed the House of Commons on Tuesday, the only division occurring on Dr. Rutherford's motion to reduce the numbers of the Army by 10,000 men. This was rejected by 247 to 100 votes. But up to the end of the debate Mr. Haldane—who, though personally popular, was greeted with absolute silence when he introduced his Estimates—received little Liberal support, and none on the question of his approval of the Alliance scheme of indirect conscription. The criticism of Mr. Haldane was of a dual character. The members of the Blue Water school, like Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Harold Cox, objected to Mr. Haldane's abandonment of naval defence, Mr. Cox saying that if Mr. Haldane induced the people to believe that their safety depended on soldiers and not on ships they would say, "Let us pay for soldiers and let us cease to pay for ships." Sir George Robertson, representing central Liberalism, criticised Mr. Haldane's statement that we should be ready to throw a force on to the Continent, as destroying the argument that Germany was the aggressor in the war of armaments.

* * *

The second objection, which was very sternly phrased, was that of the Labor men, led by Mr. Henderson, and the Peace Radicals, represented by Mr. Bright, Mr. Maddison—in a very brilliant and powerful speech—Mr. Byles, and many others, to Mr. Haldane's endorsement of the Alliance Company's action. Mr. Henderson called this a flagrant violation of freedom and an insidious form of compulsory service, and Mr. Belloc drew a powerful picture of the way in which conscription and police surveillance worked together in conscript countries. To this Mr. Haldane replied, declining to withdraw his approval of the action of the Alliance Company on the ground that there must be "freedom" for employers to reject non-teetotallers or members of Trade Unions. But he added that, as the ranks of the Territorial Army were being rapidly filled, further action like that of Lord Rothschild was unnecessary, and he made a general profession of adherence to voluntaryism.

The most important and serviceable speech of the debate came from Mr. Balfour. It was friendly to the Territorial Army, with qualifications on the points of the destruction of the Militia and of the weakness of the Special Reserve. It also expressed some doubt whether in the case of a raid it would be possible to count on this force having received a previous six months' training. But Mr. Balfour thought that it would in the end prove "invaluable" for national safety, and declared, satisfactorily enough, for voluntary service. His chief point, however, was his strong affirmation of the principles of national defence which he laid down when he was Prime Minister. These were that the Navy guaranteed us against invasion in force, and that the purpose of home defence was merely to guard against raids. This dictum, if Mr. Balfour adheres to it more firmly than he has stuck to Free Trade, will check Conservative support of the National Service League and its propaganda. On the other hand, Mr. Wyndham and Mr. Lee both showed a tendency to favor conscription.

* * *

Austria and Servia are believed to be on the eve of a settlement. On Saturday last the Austrian Ambassador informed the Servian Government that the provisional Commercial Treaty with Servia would not be ratified until Servia made known at Vienna her resolve "to maintain peaceful and neighborly relations," but that as soon as that was done, Austria would be prepared to enter on negotiations concerning trade and communications. This was intended to be conciliatory, and during the week the Servian Government with Russian assistance has been drafting a note to the Powers which is expected to satisfy these conditions. In this note Servia announces her peaceful intentions, and her readiness to leave the Bosnian question to the settlement of the Powers. It would seem that the course to be followed will be a direct arrangement between Austria and Servia, to be subsequently ratified or approved by the Powers signatory to the Berlin Treaty; but this is somewhat guess work, for the diplomatic situation seems to be needlessly and deliberately tortuous and obscure. One fact, however, upon which all reports are agreed, is that there will be no war; and if the loan mongers and the war munition contractors have now made all they think practicable, the trouble ought to end quickly.

* * *

The elections to the Italian Chamber took place on Sunday, and resulted in very little change in the general strength of parties. Signor Giolitti's majority remains intact and overwhelming: the constitutional Opposition has lost a few seats, the Republicans and Socialists have gained a few. The really interesting feature of the struggle was the fight between anti-Clericals and Clericals. The Pope was very much averse from a formal entry of the Catholics into the electoral field, but many of the Bishops and the Cardinals desired it, the veto on Catholics voting was suspended, and Catholic candidates were run in many constituencies. In Lombardy these scored a few successes, but in Rome the anti-clerical bloc won an overwhelming victory. The general result of this intervention in politics—an intervention which is in fundamental conflict both with the Papal protest against the Italian monarchy and Papal universality—is considered to have been most unfortunate for the Church. Signor Giolitti will recast his Cabinet, and Signor Tittoni, the Foreign Minister, who was the Catholic leader, and is one of the least trustworthy of European statesmen, is certain to be dropped overboard.

Sunday last was a bad day for M. Clemenceau. Thirteen of the seats vacated owing to the Senatorial elections had to be filled, and M. Clemenceau's artillery was specially directed against the Socialists. Eight results were decided outright. M. Clemenceau carried his candidate in the Var, his own constituency, against the Socialist, but the Socialists captured a seat from him at Lyons, and they are certain to carry another at Amiens at the second ballots. Even where they did not win, the Socialist vote increased heavily, and the Radical vote dropped correspondingly, and the Socialists marked an advance in constituencies where they had hitherto been able to make no progress. The "Débats" admits that "the electoral tide is decidedly in favor of the Socialists." It looks very much as though the subdued quarrel between M. Clemenceau and the advanced Radicals had broken out openly in the electorate, and that many advanced Radical electors were giving their votes to the Socialists, as their best way of marking their disapproval of M. Clemenceau's lukewarm zeal for social reform, and his coquetting with the reactionaries.

* * *

Our Paris correspondent writes:—"The Income Tax Bill has been finally adopted by the Chamber by the great majority of 407 against 166. M. Caillaux made a fine speech in the concluding debate, in which he tore to pieces the argument that the poor suffer if the rich are taxed; the Chamber decided to placard the speech. M. Caillaux will want all his ability to pilot the Bill through the Senate without destructive amendment; but he may be relied upon to stand to his guns. The difficulty between him and M. Picard has been compromised, but the exact nature of the terms agreed upon is not yet known; it is satisfactory that M. Caillaux's resignation has been avoided, as nobody else could have taken his place in the conduct of the Income Tax."

* * *

The Free Church Council has been holding its annual meetings at Swansea. It passed a strong resolution on education, declaring against (a) contracting out, (b) the right of entry, (c) the giving of denominational instruction by head or assistant teachers. It also condemned, by a majority, the secular solution; though we do not see how, on the basis of the parent resolution, Cowper-Templeism can be retained intact. The general temper of the Congress was singularly progressive, and there were signs that the fear of the forward theological movement is disappearing. We regret to see one exception to this tolerance of spirit in the shape of Mr. Hocking's violent attack on Romanism. Mr. Hocking hinted that all the leading newspapers were subject to Catholic control or inspiration. Will Mr. Hocking name one such journal? He can no more do this than find a single echo for his intemperate speech, which, according to Dr. H. S. Lunn, marks a somewhat discourteous use of social privileges sought by him in Rome. Mr. Hocking vaguely charged Nonconformist members with "treachery" over the question of the inspection of convents, and we are sorry to see that his not very coherent statement was cheered to the echo. We note with pleasure that the Council has decided to include women in its executive, and that Mrs. Lloyd George is to be one of the first members.

* * *

On Tuesday the Prime Minister made a very clear and powerful rejoinder on the new points of the Protectionist case at a joint meeting of Liberal and Unionist Free Traders at the Queen's Hall. The speech should be read in extenso by all who are interested in the fiscal controversy. Mr. Asquith showed that the export of British capital, which Protectionists used to regard as a capital sign of rising prosperity and now treat as a proof of Britain's fall, meant in the main the exchange of British products for food and raw material. He quoted some striking figures from the "Economist" showing that the amount of British capital exported and invested abroad was 3,000 millions, and that of this 2,300 millions were invested in countries from which our only exports were food and raw materials. This great mass of profitable wealth had not diminished the amount of home wealth. Thus the assessment to the income tax rose from 762 millions in 1898-9 to 943 millions in 1906-7, an increase of twenty-four per cent. obtained while the population had only grown 8·3 per cent. Mr. Asquith also showed that the old preferential basis of Protection was gone, the proposal of the Tariff Commission being to place a 2s.-a-quarter tax on foreign cereals, and a 1s. tax on Colonial cereals. Thus all the Colonies will get is to be put on a minimum tariff in exchange for the untaxed entry which Free Trade gives them. Lord Balfour of Burleigh made a rattling attack on the Confederates, and divided the Protectionists into two classes—the Chamberlainite "whole-hoggers," and the Balfourian "hedge-hoggers."

* * *

The Finance Reform Committee of the Reichstag has approved a compromise arranged by its sub-committee, according to which the death duties proposed by the Government are to be replaced by a sum of £5,000,000 to be raised by the States by means of direct taxes. This compromise was voted by the bloc against the Socialists and the Centre; as is their way, the Radical leaders gave way at the last moment. It is not expected that the Reichstag will accept the Committee's compromise. All the Radical, and even such National Liberal papers as the "Kölnische Zeitung" have denounced it, and the Finance Ministers of the State regard it as at once utterly disorganising the State Budgets and threatening State autonomy. Were the compromise adopted it would mean that the Empire could not for many years tap direct taxation, so that inevitable future demands for revenue would have to be met mainly by drawing on the resources of the poor, already disproportionately overtaxed. So utterly illusory is the proposed arrangement that its authors are hastening to declare that their decision is purely provisional, and a return to the Government's death duties is being talked of, though such a step would be bitterly opposed by the Agrarians.

* * *

Lord Esher, lecturing at the Royal Institution on Queen Victoria, gave, by the King's permission, some fresh and very interesting extracts from the hundred volumes of the Queen's journals, the most voluminous personal record of Royalty in existence. He does full justice to the Queen's courage, industry, perfect truthfulness, and hatred of war, combined with unshaken support of the national cause when war had broken out. But he is unduly courtier-like when he says that she made only one serious error in her life, her very natural retirement during the period of her widowhood, while he ignores her persistent hostility to the union of Italy, her uncritical adherence to the Austrian and the Prussian causes, and her steadily growing anti-Liberalism, involving her, as they did, in continual conflicts with Russell and Palmerston and, later on, Gladstone. "The Queen," said Lord Esher, "never seemed to doubt that the country was hers, that the Ministers were her Ministers, and that the people were her people. Ministers and Parliaments existed to assist her to govern. She was the ruler of her kingdom, and the Crown was, in her eyes, not the coping-stone of the fabric, but the foundation upon which the fabric rested." All that we can say is that if Queen Victoria held this view, her statesmen, her constitutionalists, and her people did not share it with her.

* * *

Last Saturday a battalion of the Imperial Guard in garrison at Yildiz Kiosk mutinied and demonstrated in favor of the Sultan before the Palace windows. The Committee of Union and Progress had attached Constitutionalist officers to the Imperial Guard immediately after the proclamation of the Constitution. But many of the old despotic officers remained, and between these and the Constitutionalist officers a quarrel subsisted in which the soldiers sided with the reactionaries. The mutiny was immediately suppressed and the mutinous battalion was broken up and distributed among other regiments. This is the second outbreak in the Imperial Guard since the revolution. After the mutiny of last October, which was only suppressed after some bloodshed, it was resolved to withdraw the whole of this second division from the Palace and replace it with dependable troops, but apparently the resolution was not carried out. Saturday's episode fully justifies the Committee's policy of keeping large numbers of officers and the Salonika battalions in the capital—a policy which an article appearing in the "Times" on the same day as the news of the mutiny, declared to be an "abuse" because no further mutinies in the Palace Guard were to be apprehended after Parliament had met. It likewise throws light on the attempt made by Kiamil Pasha to send the Salonika battalions to Albania, an attempt which precipitated his downfall. Reactionary tampering with the troops is manifestly still in progress.

* * *

The cross actions for divorce, which Mr. and Mrs. Stirling brought against each other in the Edinburgh Court of Session, were decided on Wednesday by Lord Guthrie finding for Mr. Stirling and against Mrs. Stirling. Eighteen days, as the judge said, or a time equal to a Scottish University winter session, have been spent in deciding whether four "selfish idle people" were adulterers or merely flirts. The judge, caustically describing their habits, declared them to be of a low mental endowment, lacking good taste and feeling and serious human interests, and given up to self-indulgence. The wife breakfasted in bed at mid-day, and the whole party spent one Sunday in manicuring each others' nails. These people, said Lord Guthrie, all treated life as a comedy, but they had made a pitiful and costly tragedy of it. He might, perhaps, have added that such a view, if not representative of a large class, was yet general enough to mark the type of pleasure-lovers who have succeeded the workers and wealth-gatherers of mid-Victorian Britain. Confinement to a labor colony would probably be the best cure for this form of unemployment; certainly the regimen there would be better than mutual manicuring.

* * *

We are glad to see that Mr. Lloyd George has stamped on a scandalous libel, which has been carried to very gross lengths. Another public man has been similarly victimised, without a shadow of a shade of foundation. We have never known a more sickening atmosphere of malignant gossip—some of it with a distinct party animus—than has prevailed of late; and it was quite time to clear the air of it.

Politics and Affairs.

THE DOMINANT ISSUE AGAIN.

We hope that the public will take note, for future reference, of the course taken by Lord Lansdowne and Lord Curzon in mutilating the Indian Councils Bill. The issue is, perhaps, a little complicated by the action of Lord Macdonnell. It was at his instance that the Peers eliminated Clause 3, which enables the Government of India to substitute government by Lieutenant-Governors and a Council for the unqualified rule of Lieutenant-Governors acting alone. The two great Indian Presidencies, Madras and Bombay, already possess this form of control. The other six provinces are without it, but the practical intention of Lord Morley's proposal is, for the present, to provide a form of Council Government for the Bengals alone. Lord Macdonnell's idea in striking out the Clause appears to be in the main to obtain a redistribution of Bengal boundaries, which, by setting up a fairly homogeneous Hindu province, would appease or possibly end the present agitation. For Lord Macdonnell's purpose, it need not be said, the Lords have no apparent care, and they have used his manœuvre not to soothe Indian discontent, but to awaken it. While, however, they did not scruple to destroy a valuable and, indeed, essential part of the reforming machinery, they preferred, if possible, to set Lord Morley and the Indian Government by the ears, instead of pitting themselves in form against the latter power. Accordingly, Lord Lansdowne proposed that the Clause should be "held back" until further authoritative support of it could be obtained. This happened on Thursday of last week. On Tuesday, Lord Morley acting, as he has acted all through this controversy, with singular tenderness to conservative critics of his scheme, was able to supply the best authority of all, that, namely, of the Government of India. This body declared that they were in favor of Clause 3, that they regarded it as flowing directly from the enlargement of the Legislative Councils, and that they would regret it if the power conferred on them by Clause 3 were thrown away.

Lord Morley was thus able to present an overwhelming force of expert opinion in favor of this change. He had first obtained the assent of his own Council. He had fortified it with the report of the Decentralisation Commission. He had the support of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, a province to which immediately the one application of Clause 3 is to be made. He had, as "Civilian" in the "Times" points out, the immense weight not only of great Indian administrators like Sir Henry Maine, Sir H. M. Durand, Sir George Campbell, Sir W. Grey, and Sir Bartle Frere, but of the majority of the Indian Government in 1868, when the whole question was thoroughly debated. Finally, he could quote the Indian Government in Council in 1909, expressly converted from its hostile opinion of three years earlier. It would seem that when a reforming statesman had marshalled on his side an array of authorities so cautious, so bureaucratic by temper and experience, as the Government of India, the question of a slight modification of bureaucracy would have been settled. But that was not all. Behind the Government of India, Lord Morley was able to place the two chief branches of the peoples of India, agreeing to sink their differences on other points of the Morley scheme. As soon as the action of the Lords was known, Hindus and Mohammedans, uniting their forces, held a great demonstration in favor of the retention of Clause 3. Even the correspondent of the "Times" was not able to allege any serious set of Anglo-Indian opinion against this obviously practical and consequential change. A Lieutenant-Governor is here and there quoted as hostile, but the favorable balance is overwhelming. It has not availed to secure the reinstatement of the Clause, which was contemptuously pushed aside by Lord Lansdowne and Lord Curzon, and was negatived without a division.

We come swiftly back, therefore, to the "dominant issue." The Indian Councils Bill might have been passed by the consent of both Houses of Parliament. It would thus have gone to India as the gift of the whole British nation. It will go instead as the gift of the British democracy, for we assume that the House of Commons will at once reinstate the lost clause, and that the Peers will not venture in this case to contest its will. The action of the Lords merely gives the measure of their care for the good government of the Empire. The setting up of Executive Councils for Bengal is an indirect device of healing for the still open sore of the partition of the province. It does not avoid partition, but it at once raises the status of the province, unduly depressed by the dividing act, to something nearer equality with Madras and Bombay, and it gives unity and a progressive character to the general fabric of provincial government in India. It would have been bad enough if the House of Lords had cut in between Lord Morley and the Indian Government, and widened the existing differences between his statesmanship and its reserves and timidities. But it is worse still to try and dam the movement of reform at a point below that at which the stream of British Liberalism and Anglo-Indian bureaucracy are willing to flow along together. It is in such work that we obtain the measure of the uselessness of the House of Lords, of its fractious, unenlightened temper. Nothing was more difficult than Lord Morley's task at the moment when it seemed improbable that he could carry English Liberalism with him on the policy of the deportations in Bengal. The party chafed again and again under the concessions to coercion, and a breach was avoided only because the prize to be won was the Indian Government's assent to and co-operation with a liberal scheme of reforms. Now that this has been gained it seems possible for India to survive her great political crisis and to work out a new and promising relationship with the supervising Power. This is the moment which the House of Lords selects to send out a kind of fishing inquiry to discover how many Lieutenant-Governors and other permanent officials are prepared to stand out against a measure which slightly distributes their less important executive functions, though it reserves them the power of over-ruling the two Councils which may be set up. Lord Morley is introducing no new principle into Indian Government; Bengal might have had her executive council more than forty years ago. But the Lords measure nothing in politics but their own prejudices or interests, and when they are encountered, neither social order, as the Irish and now the Indian case shows, nor the verdict of local experience, nor the will of peoples, avail one jot.

COQUETTING WITH CONSCRIPTION.

Those who retain some affection for historic Liberalism, and some belief in its moral value to mankind, must have rubbed their eyes during the passage of the Army Estimates. Here is a Liberal Minister who has set himself the simple task of providing an improved equipment and training for the Volunteer Forces of the country. For these Forces a strictly limited purpose has been assigned by the considered speech on national defence which Mr. Balfour delivered in 1905 and repeated on Tuesday last. This was the repulse of a small raid, conducted by 10,000 men, escaping the vigilance of a Navy which, equally on Mr. Balfour's and Mr. Haldane's postulates, would render invasion, in the sense of an Armada, impossible. To that doctrine Mr. Haldane specifically pledged himself in 1906, and on that basis he has built the Territorial Army. Whether the character and organisation of the Territorials is fitted for the defeat of the improbable purpose which it was designed to frustrate is a matter on which military critics are divided. But it need not greatly concern us. If such a raid took place, under the given conditions of surprise or treachery, the Regular Army would be there to deal with it. That Force would never leave these shores unless and until the Navy had guaranteed the command of the seas, and therefore our own complete immunity from invasion. On the other hand, if such a command were lacking, neither one million nor four million soldiers locked up in these islands could save their inhabitants from starvation. Defeat at the hand of an invading foe would not greatly intensify their misery, victory would not relieve it, and for those sufficient reasons, our enemy would spare himself the construction of a superfluous Armada. If, again, a small force, escaping the vigilance of a predominant British Navy, landed on these shores, the crushing of so rash, if not hopeless, an enterprise should be well within the compass of a fairly trained Volunteer Force, stiffened by regulars. Mr. Haldane's task, therefore, was easy and familiar. It has been defined again and again, notably by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, and it was not necessary to attack it under limelight. Mr. Haldane had, first, to keep a small, well-trained Regular Army fitted for its work in India and in other foreign garrisons, and for the waging of small frontier wars with badly-equipped tribes. He had, secondly, to satisfy the public mind by giving it an enhanced efficiency in its auxiliary Volunteer Service. He was commissioned by his party to cut down the irrational cost of our military arm; and for the rest to remember that the defence of the country depended on sea-water, on ships, on its relationships to foreign Powers, and on its own rational, unaggressive policy and demeanor.

Unfortunately, Mr. Haldane, while he has attained a certain success on the practical issue set before him, has of late forgotten most of these considerations. He has called for the "nation in arms." He has asked the Colonies to co-operate with him in creating an Imperial Army of twenty-three corps, equal in number to that of the first military Power in the world, and on Thursday last he stated in the House of Commons that its true objective was "the enemy's coast-line," i.e., a Continental expedition in face of a conscript army numbering millions of men. He has called Conscription a "debatable matter," for which much might be said in regard to home defence; and he has patronised a play founded on the theory that invasion was possible, that it could only be repelled by highly-trained soldiers, and that in such an effort levies like Mr. Haldane's Territorials or the old Volunteers were ridiculous encumbrances. Finally, he has blessed the action of a large Assurance Company in forcing its employees to become members of the Territorial Army. Thus we have every kind of megalomaniac heresy set up by a Liberal Minister after even the Conservative Party, as the result of a careful examination of the problem of defence, had come round to a safe, sound, and unambitious conclusion concerning it.

Now we entirely demur to the theory that Mr. Haldane has a right to describe his scheme as the alternative, or even the last obstacle, to Conscription. We have nothing to say against the Territorial Army—though we doubt the strength of the Special Reserve, and the wisdom of abolishing the Militia—and should have thought a Liberal Minister prudent in seeking a democratic rather than an aristocratic leading for it. But Mr. Haldane's success or failure depends on the soundness of his calculations and arrangements. If these are bad, his scheme suffers, but Conscription remains not less absurd and unnecessary than it was before the Territorial Army was heard of. No country is going to burden itself with an extra twenty millions, or even four millions, for armed defence, in order to produce a force incapable of saving it from surrender by treaty, or failing that, from national starvation. The moment the people come to think about Conscription they will reject it, for they will be faced with half-a-dozen unanswerable dilemmas—the impossibility of either including or excluding Ireland, the impossibility of asking a conscript army to cross the ocean and serve thousands of miles from home, the impossibility of having anything but universal service, and the number of unnecessary men that such an instrument would produce. If, therefore, Mr. Haldane fails, and if the thoughtless movement to Conscription gains an ounce of momentum as the result of it, the blame will lie with Mr. Haldane's besetting obscurity of thought and recklessness of language. He was asked to work on definite lines, to a definite end—to provide a fresh start and new local associations for a somewhat lifeless and unreal citizen force, not to speak of Continental wars and landings, and by a miracle of tactlessness, to link the self-governing Colonies, including the always suspicious Australia, on to the stale ambitions of Pitt and Castlereagh. It was not Mr. Haldane, but the leader of the Tory Party, who on Tuesday night brought the country back to a sober theory of defence, which turns the talk of "Imperial armies," and "a nation in arms," and "23 army corps," into mere barrack-room rhetoric.

It is happily true that no existing school of British statesmanship can take a serious step towards disturbing the conclusions reached by the Committee of Defence four years ago, and we may accept Mr. Haldane's assurances that he means to stick to voluntaryism. But the moral attitude of a nation can be warped by the preaching of false ideals, and the use of a vain, purposeless, and boastful vocabulary in relation to a modest auxiliary of home defence. There is only a limited stock of popular interest in politics, and it may either be turned to sincere thought about life or wasted in frivolous sensationalism. The Liberal Party has spent much of its energies in defending the religious freedom of the schoolmaster from the parson, and the political freedom of the laborer both from the squire and from his employer. It is grievously embarrassed when one of its own chiefs condones the attempt of employers to dictate to their workers what form of service they shall give to the community, and what kind of exercise they shall take outside their hours of work. We think that even if Mr. Haldane's defence of such action—a defence for which he made no apology in the face of united Liberal and Labor protests—might have been excused on the ground of excess of zeal, the Prime Minister should have expressly guarded the party from an endorsement of it. Unfortunately, no word of recantation—save Mr. Haldane's suggestion that having done it once, he need not do it again—was forthcoming from the Treasury Bench during the long debates on the Army Estimates. No Liberal member or journalist should be put to the necessity of arguing against Conscription, with the chance that a member of a Liberal Cabinet can be quoted against him. We believe that the purpose of this Government is to keep the eyes of the people steadily fixed on their own plain deficiencies in education, on the organisation of our industrial and intellectual society, as well as on the sheer backwardness and darkness of the lowest forms of poverty. In such an atmosphere a Liberal Ministry really lives and thrives; and if support fails it, it can rally when in opposition against the ideas which it resolutely kept at a distance when it was in power. But if it plays with reactionary forces, it rears in time such giant perversities as during the last decade have assailed it in the shape of Protection and Conscription.

A SERMON IN STONES.

The attack made by Protectionists and certain Labor men upon the Admiralty for allowing their contractors to import dressed Scandinavian granite instead of using Scotch or Cornish stone is instructive in several ways. The facts are not seriously in dispute. Norway and Sweden have the best supply of granite in the world of every variety of hardness and color. Large open quarries lie close alongside the fjords, so that steamers can practically load without carriage. On the other hand, Cornish or Aberdeen blocks have to be quarried at considerable depth, hoisted to the surface, put into position for masons to work, loaded in wagons, and carted often several miles to the quay, from which they are loaded on to steamers. The difference in cost is thus considerable. Ought our Government to forego the advantage of this naturally cheaper foreign stone and pay a large sum in order that the granite may be quarried and dressed in these isles? The question deserves serious discussion, and cannot be entirely settled by a simple reference to the general maxim that Governments, like individuals, should always buy in the cheapest market. Our Government has never accepted the full validity of the maxim in placing orders or contracts. Though every department has freely exercised the right to make purchases abroad of stores or other supplies, foreign firms have not been allowed to compete for the important public contracts on equal terms with British firms, even in cases where the work admitted of being carried on abroad. On the other hand, Mr. Macnamara was quite right in stating that it has been the practice of all Governments, Conservative and Liberal, to give British contractors for public works full liberty to buy their materials where they liked. The question of policy, then, that is now raised is whether this rule ought to be modified in such a case as that of this supply of granite. The attempt to draw across the trail the "red herring" of sweated foreign labor collapses before the evidence that the Norwegian quarrymen and masons are well organised in unions, and get, in fact, as high a rate of wages as similar workers in this country. The real question is this: Ought the Government to pay an extra sum of £30,000 in order to get the work done by British quarrymen and masons instead of by Scandinavians? Some Free Traders limit their consideration to foreign trade, and adduce the single argument that the Norwegian granite will be paid for by some increased export of British products. It is true that our export trade will be less if we use British instead of Scandinavian granite. We shall lose in freights, in the export of the coal which our ships carry on the outward voyage to Norway, and in the handling of the goods conveyed. But the reduction of export trade may be partly compensated by an increase of internal trade; sums used to pay for foreign granite may be kept in this country, and go to pay for British granite. There will be less foreign trade, but some increase of aggregate British trade. On the other hand the extra £30,000 means that the granite industry is to this extent to be subsidised by the State, or, in a word, that expenditure and employment are to be diverted from other industries. It is possible to conceive that if a Labor Department were entrusted with large powers to deal with unemployment the Labor Minister might urge upon the Admiralty this extra expenditure of £30,000 as a contributory method of dealing with unemployment, or might even subsidise the Admiralty for this purpose from an Unemployed Fund.

If we are to meet successfully the pressure which Tariff Reformers are making on the Unemployed Question, we must partly separate such an issue from that of employing a tariff. For the granite will be bought and paid for by British revenue—that is, by orders upon British goods—whether it is bought from Norway or from Aberdeen and Cornwall. The goods which, in the one case, would have gone to granite producers in Norway, go in the other case to producers within the British Isles. The true issue, then, as we understand it, is this: "Is it or is it not a sound policy for Government to subsidise with £30,000 the British granite industry in order to find it more employment than it would get by free competition with Norway?" Not only Unionists but some Labor men appear to argue that the ordinary sane policy upon which every private business man and most public bodies conduct their business should be set aside in such a case in favor of a cheap and easy mode of meeting temporary unemployment. Now, we agree that such a policy of subsidy is neither so dear nor so disastrous as the use of a tariff to secure the same end. For the first result of a protective tariff upon granite would be to put up the price of the entire supply of granite, and, by increasing the cost of building, to divert expenditure and employment from other trades into the favored trade. A preference to British quarries in a contract might not have this full effect of raising prices on the whole trade.

But when we are invited to approve what is in effect a State subsidy to a particular group of unemployed persons, by turning in their direction an expensive contract which would have gone elsewhere, we must demur. A constructive State policy for unemployment must not be imposed upon our ordinary spending departments as a by-function. If quarries in Aberdeen or Cornwall are standing idle because Norway can produce better or cheaper stone for delivering here, it is not sound public policy to bolster up artificially a British industry which would thereby be led to retain more capital and labor than it can normally and naturally support. If our granite quarries are being out-competed by Scandinavian quarries, it is foolish to keep within that trade a larger body of workers than it will be able to find regular employment for. Nor could a single contract thus artificially secured prove more than a brief respite, unless it formed, as it would tend to form, a precedent for a continuous (and endless) policy of subsidies. Moreover, if we prop up a weak member of a trade, we prop it up not only against the foreign competitor, but against its more vigorous native rival.

What speciousness, indeed, attaches to the claim for such a preference is due to a short-sighted regard for single instances, which neglects the wider economics of the Free Trade policy, upon which Mr. Asquith dwelt with so much lucidity in his speech on Tuesday. His central argument was directed towards another aspect of the same fallacy that lurks in the granite blocks. The notion is that an increased aggregate of sound employment can be provided for our workers by keeping capital at home, and so reducing our export trade. But, as Mr. Asquith reminded his audience, Mr. Chamberlain first raised his tocsin of alarm by pointing to the imaginary decadence of this very export trade. For the act of foreign investment is identical with the exportation of British goods, which constitute the only capital we can detach from home employment. We may, indeed, say of them that they lie abroad for their country's good. If by any restrictive legislation we kept this capital at home, it would not fructify, as it does by foreign travel. We do not, in fact, send capital abroad which is required for use at home. Its forcible retention here would not enhance the aggregate productivity of British labor, or raise the general volume of employment, any more than would a preference for British granite over other goods which we can buy better or more cheaply from other nations.

THE STALEMATE OF CONTINENTAL SOCIALISM.

A NATION bored with itself—that, in a phrase, is the impression which Italy has given to distant observers during the General Election of this week. The routine of the urns has been fulfilled, and once more there confront each other in proportions but little modified, an overgrown governing party, which hardly boasts a principle, and Opposition groups which can only repeat a watchword. Signor Giolitti and the Liberal Opportunists asked only for a mechanical renewal of office, and they were content to gain it by a mechanical exercise of power. Neither he nor his Conservative opponent, Baron Sonnino, troubled to make speeches. The strength of the governing party—if a majority so mixed can be called a party—lies not in ideas, or arguments, or programmes, but simply in the fact that it has in its hands the vast machinery of patronage. The weakness of its opponents lies in the fact that they are anything and everything but a possible Government. Radicals, Republicans, and Socialists formed in most districts a loosely-knit coalition for mutual support against the Opportunists and the Clericals. Their numbers have risen from 61 to 76. But their appeal was restricted by their own self-imposed limitations. The Radicals no doubt would be ready to take office, but they lack conspicuous men. The Socialists in Italy, as everywhere on the Continent, can attract magnetic leaders of indisputable ability, and what is rarer, of high integrity. But despite their breach with the impossibly violent Syndicalist faction—Trade Unionism in Italy, as in France, is incomparably more reckless than the orthodox Parliamentary Socialism—and the readiness of most of them to act with other groups of the Extreme Left, they are still fundamentally a party of protest, which cannot assume office or vote a Budget in its entirety. The Republicans are little more than a splendid survival of the Mazzinist tradition, holding high "the banner of the ideal," and surrendering the present for the future, which is infinitely remote. They too, by their academic protest against monarchy, are permanently excluded from office.

This coalition has slightly increased its strength at the polls and in the Chamber. But what appeal can it make to an electorate busied with the real problems of daily life? The idealist, the student, the embittered pessimist may be attracted to groups whose main function is protest. But a modern democracy asks for results, and Socialism cannot give it results until it is prepared to assume the burden of office and to face the necessity of an honest compromise. It is on a large scale the situation of Mr. Galsworthy's "Strife." On the practical business of the moment, the realisable minimum programme of Socialism, it is conceivable that a united Left, if it boldly asked for a majority and demanded power, might carry the country. But to one leader the essential seems to be to protest against the bourgeois state, to another to prophesy against the harmless trappings of a very deserving monarchy. The leaders keep their principles intact, and while they enjoy the consciousness of being the over-men of theory, Italy stagnates under a sterile opportunism. "That is where the fun comes in." The result is that the Italian elector must choose, on the one hand, between inveterate governing parties engaged in a mere scramble for power, unable to decide whether they are really for or against the Triple Alliance, and ready in one constituency to compromise with Clericalism and in another to oppose it; and on the other, opposition groups which can promise nothing because they will assume no responsibility

All over Europe the same phenomenon repeats itself, and everywhere its root cause is the same. Liberalism, unable to conclude any stable alliance with Socialism, is everywhere forced into a more or less demoralising opportunism. M. Clemenceau turns away from the Left for allies, precisely as Signor Giolitti coquets with Clericalism. In both countries Socialism continues to register a slow, but steady, progress at the expense of opportunist Liberalism. The balance is invariably redressed by a movement in which Liberalism itself takes a few hesitating steps towards the Centre or the Right. Of this universal misfortune the decision of the Amsterdam International Socialist Congress was the prime cause. It forbade any Socialist deputy to enter a coalition Government—a decision which makes outcasts of the Millerands, the Briands, and the Vivianis. It forbade any Socialist party to vote for the Budget of a middle-class Government—a decision which destroys the value of any Socialist party in a coalition. While these fetters forged for Europe by Bebel and his disciplined German Legion remain intact, Labor on the Continent must be an isolated force, formidable for destruction, a power in the guerilla warfare of Parliaments, a weapon which may often help to destroy a reactionary Government, but a prop on which a progressive Government will lean in vain. There was a moment when our own Whigs declared that they would refuse office unless they had a majority independent of the Irish vote. The effect of this Amsterdam decision is that no Radical, however enlightened, however sympathetic he may be with Labor, however ready he may be to admit a collectivist leaven into his Cabinet, and to inscribe its more actual proposals on his programme, can contemplate office unless he be assured of a majority independent of the Socialist vote. If there is one reason more than another why everywhere on the Continent Protection and Militarism and provocative armaments continue even under Radical Governments to make headway, it is this decision of Socialism to remain an essentially revolutionary force. It is in vain that leaders like Jaurès and Turati preach a "reformist" and evolutionary doctrine. They are the executants of a strategy which was imposed on European Socialism by Prussian and Russian votes.

These irreconcilable tactics were of German origin. It is in Germany that they are causing the maximum of disaster. Ask why it is that the South-German "Radicals" are allied to-day with the Prussian Squirearchy in Prince Bülow's parti-colored coalition, and it is no sufficient answer to say that German "Radicalism" is a party of stockbrokers and small shopkeeps, whose opinions has hardly evolved beyond the negations of the old Manchester school. It has stagnated, mainly because it could neither hope to compete with Social Democracy in its appeal to the working classes, nor arrive with it at any working compromise in the daily round of parliamentary work. The coalition seems at last to have reached a final demonstration of its own incoherence. But its destruction can lead to no more natural alliance while Social Democracy retains its defiant intransigeance. Prince Bülow won his majority on a programme of great armaments and colonial expansion. But his legions, which willed the end, are not agreed to find the means. There is a deficit of from 25 to 30 millions to face, and all the Chancellor's skill in the confection of parliamentary compromises cannot bring the Conservatives to assent to his proposals for direct taxation. The Squirearchy will agree to tax the working-man's tobacco and beer, but to death duties it will not consent. The Radicals, on their side, representing rather wealth in the making than inherited capital, are with the Government in its determination to tax unearned riches. Three courses lie before Prince Bülow. He may resign. He may appeal to the country. He may compromise and form a new majority, form among Conservatives and the Catholic Centre. Whether under his leadership or under that of a successor, whether with this or with a new Reichstag, Imperialism can ultimately hold its own only with a majority in which Conservatives of every line—clerical, industrial, and agrarian—form the governing party. The logic of the situation is once more forcing the Radicals towards opposition. But it is an opposition which must be sterile and irremediable. Future they have none, save in alliance with Labor, and Labor cannot aid them to become a governing party, while Social Democracy retains its present principles. The feud has gone so far, save, perhaps, in the South, that one can hardly conceive a Radical-Socialist combination even for purposes of unflinching opposition. But even were it possible, even were it popular, it would cease to exist at the moment when the electors had turned it from a minority into a majority. The Amsterdam decision is at present the chief promoter of reaction, and the mainstay of militarism throughout the Continent. Its reversal is the condition precedent to any European movement for the reduction of armaments and the checking of militarism. It is in vain that Socialism stands everywhere for peace and disarmament, so long as it insists on standing alone.

THE LESSON OF THE SCOTTISH ELECTIONS.

By One Who Knows.

We make no apology for reverting again this week to this topic, and we have been at some pains to ascertain from local sources the truth and inwardness of the Scottish verdict. In our opinion they give a seasonable and informatory lesson to the public and Government of England.

In Forfarshire it is a mistake to suppose that the calibre of Mr. Falconer and the manifest acquaintance that he showed with public affairs throughout his candidature did so much for him as might be conjectured. The Unionist cause was, from the Unionist point of view, excellently championed. Mr. Blackburn is a King's Counsel, a son-in-law of the Earl of Strathmore, one of the great landlords of a great county. He is steeped in the prepossessions of his party and social circle on the subject of the land, and he had adopted the whole-hogger type of Unionism on the subject of Tariff Reform. The issues were straight issues, both of them—Scottish land reform and tampering with Free Trade.

Now Mr. Blackburn had, if it was available, a ready weapon to his hand. He could have repeated, as Lord Camperdown and others of that way of thinking have repeated so often in the House of Lords, that the true way of dealing with Scottish land was the Government's own way of dealing with English land—namely, through the mechanism of the County Councils, and with a bias or a weakness rather towards purchase than leasing. But this weapon broke in his hand by the very force of English experience. The whole public of England is now swinging rapidly to the conclusion that the true and safe method for England as well as Scotland would have been the creation of a direct, independent, central board, armed with a mission to effect the great national object and with power judicially to execute its mission. In England, unhappily, the interposition of the County Councils has well nigh ruined everything, and we do not wonder at men like Mr. Morrell insistently proclaiming that something more effective must be done to place English laborers upon the land under conditions of independence.

As to the preference for purchase, that also breaks to pieces before English experience. The landlords may prefer it, especially with a public body as the purchaser, and when the chances are all for a swollen price; but as for the tenants the statistics go to show that with the option before them they prefer leasing to purchase in the proportion of 97 to 3.

So that the prime issue before the electors of Forfarshire was the Scottish Land Bill—just the old Scottish Land Bill in all its main features, not refuted, but, on the contrary, confirmed by experience in England, and upon that issue the electors pronounced an unmistakable verdict of approval of the scheme ratified by public opinion in the north.

On Free Trade it appears that the issue was quite as plain, although not so large, and it is possible that Tariff Reformers may with a certain amount of justice claim that their proposals were submerged in the wave of passionate adherence to the Government's Scottish land policy.

It should be added that in this case both the candidates were Scotsmen.

In Glasgow a fair and straight issue was rendered impossible by the action of Glasgow itself. And our good Liberal friends in Glasgow may just as well listen to this in public which has too often and too long been said of them in private. The difference between Glasgow and the rest of Scotland is that in the rest of Scotland a Liberal condemns and growls at the policy of Toryism, but in Glasgow so-called leading Liberals are largely occupied in condemning and in growling at the policy of Liberalism. Whether individual causes have been pushed so far as to be contemptuous of the average opinion, or whether these people have still some years to walk in the valley of Unionist humiliation before their eyes are opened to more sensible courses, one cannot say. But the primary results of this attitude—which those acquainted with the district know so well—have been twofold. In the first place, no working accommodation has yet been possible with the Labor Party, although all the elements for such an accommodation are present. With men like Mr. Cross in Camlachie it is impossible for a moment to suggest that, granted a spirit of harmony and compromise in the progressive ranks, he would lose his seat. With men like Mr. Barnes, it is impossible to deny that, granted a similar spirit of accommodation and compromise, he would hold his seat, as he ought to hold it, against all comers.

But the second result is that really leading Glasgow Liberals—men like Sir William Bilsland, the late distinguished Lord Provost of Glasgow, a man commanding universal respect—shrink from encountering forces so disposed even in their native city. No one who knows the circumstances can doubt, for instance, that if the fight had been between a couple of clever Glasgow men the result would have been more indicative of Glasgow opinion. As it was, the brilliant candidature of Mr. Bowles, his pluck, his humor, his hard hitting, the expertness of his knowledge of finance, and his cleverness on the platform, were wet-blanketed throughout. On the other hand, Mr. Scott Dickson, the late Lord Advocate—for whose opinions in Parliament or out we never could profess that we entertained much regard, and from which even throughout his candidature little enlightenment could be had—found every omen of an external character favorable, and the average Glasgow man cannot be blamed if, in the situation so presented to him, his natural lukewarmness sent him into the polling-booth to vote the Glasgow patriotic ticket.

Since that disease to which we have referred broke out in Glasgow Liberalism, Glasgow has been the black spot in Scottish representation, and until strong-minded men arise to extirpate the trouble, or the general mass of the electorate get tired of it, and prefer ways of common sense, the black spot may remain.

In this case the contest was between a Scotsman and an Englishman.

In Edinburgh the contest was on evener terms. The popularity of the newly appointed Solicitor-General for Scotland—an appointment which does much credit to the Government, was wide-spread and undoubted. But, on the other hand, Mr. Harold Cox was a large employer of labor in or near that division of the city, and was the son of a much-respected previous member for the South Division itself. He had been for some years courting the constituency, and there can be no doubt that the issue was a very clear one—the issue of Tariff Reform. In a period of depressed trade this cause, as Mr. Bonar Law has clearly enough discerned, has its best chance. The desire for a change to something, to anything, sweeps into the ready groove of discontent which Tariff Reform eagerly presents. So the enormous electoral majority went down to the depressing total of between twelve and thirteen hundred votes! The feature of the election was, as we say, the well-nigh single issue and the persistency and power with which each side of it was discussed. Probably, upon reflection, were it not for the Border Burghs election, to which we are about to allude, Tariff Reformers would be free to confess that they have seldom received a more damaging blow than in South Edinburgh.

In this case both the candidates were Scotsmen.

We admit that it was left to the Border Burghs to supply the supreme test of Scottish opinion, and this explains to some extent the feverish anxiety with which men on both sides of the Borders awaited the result of the poll.

In 1892 a singular contest was waged in these Burghs. Sir George Trevelyan, who had sat for them for eighteen years, had become allied with the Unionist Party, and with him and against Mr. Gladstone there swung round a great body of influential men, not one of whom, it may be remarked, ever came back to the paths of Liberalism with Sir George Trevelyan himself when he returned to the Gladstonian fold after the election. The cause of out-and-out Liberalism, including adhesion to Home Rule, was championed by Mr. A. L. Brown, a leader of Scottish Liberal opinion, a man of great platform power and of the most attractive and winning personality. Mr. Brown won the seat, as probably no other man could have done, but the majority was only thirty.

When Lord Shaw of Dunfermline went to it as a candidate seventeen years ago, that, accordingly, was the situation. It is true that during his long retention of the seat, and after five keen electoral battles, the party had become solidified, and that the last Liberal majority was 681, but friends and opponents alike agreed that the rupture of close ties of attachment like these altered the situation, and that the case was a narrow one, more like that of the position of affairs in 1892. It must be said at once that the personal element did not and could not count in this election. Mr. Mackinder, although not a very old convert to Tariff Reform, was a most capable exponent of all the elements which make it attractive, and, whether on the platform or by his record, was a very excellent and powerful champion of the Unionist cause. Sir John Barran during his candidature proved himself to be equally so of the cause of Liberalism, and his aptness as a speaker, his familiarity with trade conditions, his attachment to Radical principles, including Free Trade, proved him to be a most fortunate selection. The choice was not about men, but about things.

Trade was bad, and the Tariff Reformer accordingly got his splendid chance. Mills were closed; and they were hugely placarded—regardless, too often, of the facts—as illustrations of the disasters attending Free Trade. Many men were unemployed; and these and their circle were plied with every argument of self-interest; while as for the manufacturers themselves, not five per cent. among them belonged to the Liberal Party.

It must be said, however, that this constituency, which played so fine a part in returning its member during and after the war, had not been neglected, and that shortly before the election, with no expectation in anyone's mind of a change of representation, the meetings of the sitting member, Lord Advocate Shaw, were bumper meetings, at which the leading questions of the day, including Free Trade, were keenly canvassed. The intelligence of the constituency is notorious, and it is said that for twenty years in these Burghs not one single illiterate vote has ever been recorded. It is no wonder that Liberals and the Government take heart of grace from the result, and Sir John Barran is much to be congratulated upon his emphatic victory.

The issues, curiously enough, were not confined to Free Trade. The land question, or, rather, the land and water question, had a share in public attention. The southern counties which surround the constituency are deeply interested in the Scottish Landholders' Bill. The Burghs strongly resented the treatment by the House of Lords on two occasions of the Scottish Land Valuation Bill, and, finally, the closing of great stretches of Tweedside against access by the ordinary angler had brought into prominence a proposal for reform on that subject which all the forces of Toryism will be employed to circumvent. The Government may very well indeed learn the lesson to be here derived.

In this case both the candidates were Englishmen.

Upon the whole, the reflections upon these results are consoling. Scotland remains attached to Free Trade, passionately devoted to land reform on radical lines and according to the methods which the late and the present Prime Ministers have sanctioned. Would that Radicalism south of the Borders would awake with such fearlessness and determination! We commend the Scottish example.

Life and Letters.

THE DANGER OF EUGENICS.

From the moment when Darwinian conceptions began to be applied to social affairs by Mr. Herbert Spencer it was recognised that physical science had placed a new and potent weapon in the hands of political cynicism. The theory of natural selection—a double-edged phrase which suggested and denied a purposive intelligence in one breath—could be utilised against the furtherance of social progress by human intelligence, and in particular against the older notions of equality and brotherhood. For real progress, it was urged, is to be measured by the growing adaptation of a race to its environment, and this adaptation is secured by the continuous elimination of the unfit, an elimination which is only maintained by the constant pressure of the struggle for existence. Suspend the struggle and you relax the pressure. Relax the pressure and you destroy the operation of selection. Remove selection and you allow the unfit to multiply and replenish the earth. Allow the unfit to multiply, and you not merely suspend true racial progress, but you initiate actual deterioration. Hence the dream of social justice defeats itself. Perfect equality, the reign of peace as between nations, the establishment of true co-operation between individuals, may effect an immediate and superficial improvement, but fundamentally would lower the life-value of the stock by allowing the multiplication of its least worthy members—those who, where life is relatively hard and ruthless, are perpetually weeded out, to the ultimate profit of the species. This is a view which in one form or another, generally more or less wrapped up for the sake of moral decency, has served as a defence for every bad institution and every act of social or international injustice for upwards of a generation.

Unfortunately for the value of this doctrine, it not only conflicts with the ethical consciousness of mankind, but with the whole stream of human history. In so far as civilisation means anything at all, it is a process in which the bare struggle for existence is progressively overcome and replaced by the more deliberate organisation of social life, and the measure of civilised progress is the degree in which the anarchical struggle of all against all has given way to an ordered co-operation in a whole of many parts. The scope of "natural" selection diminishes steadily as civilised life advances, a proposition which is not reconcilable with the view that natural selection is the foundation of all progress. The repeated exposition of this criticism in a variety of forms has by degrees had its influence on the biologists, and the result is to be seen in the growth of the more recent ideal of eugenics, which is due principally to the genius of Mr. Francis Galton, and which was ably expounded by Dr. Saleeby at a meeting of the Sociological Society last week.

The eugenist may be said to accept the fact that for civilised society to entrust progress to natural selection—that is, in reality to the blind elimination of all who cannot maintain themselves under any given conditions—involves a contradiction. But he clings to the principle that social progress is at bottom race progress, and that race progress is to be achieved by selection. Accordingly, for natural selection he substitutes a human and artificial selection. He contemplates the weeding out of bad types, not by leaving living individuals to misery and death, but by preventing them from marrying. More dimly he conceives a positive eugenics, as a system whereby we shall not only improve the race by weeding out the bad, but by selecting the good, and breeding Beethovens or Shakespeares as a pigeon fancier breeds fantails. The conception is as old as Plato, and, granting it all it postulates, it is difficult to deny it a measure of validity. If, that is to say, we suppose adequate knowledge of all that we wish to breed for—that is to say, of all the elements of real value to a society on the one hand, and a full understanding of the laws of heredity on the other, or if we grant further a power existing in society impartial enough to apply this knowledge without fear or favor, and strong enough to impose acceptance on individual men and women, we should admit that eugenics would become a very important branch of applied social science.

But the possibilities of eugenics in the present or the near future seem much more modest. In the first place the whole science of heredity is still in confusion. It is the scene of interminable controversies between contending factions, and while there is no reason to doubt that the mental and moral qualities distinguishing manhood, so far as they are congenital, are quite as hereditary as the physical characteristics of men and animals, there is great uncertainty as to the basis of heredity, the conditions under which any apparent quality will be inherited, the effects, direct or indirect, of environment, and the limits of what can be achieved by the inheritance of small individual variations. Until the biologists have settled among themselves what heredity is and how it works, they cannot intervene with much effect outside their own province. They can only proceed comparatively by pointing to the established results in certain special cases, like that of alcoholism. In the second place, till we are much more definitely agreed than we are at present about the structure of society, the needs of social life, and the possibilities of development, we have no means of determining the type—or rather the multifarious types—which we desire to breed.

Here again the eugenist is on fairly strong ground when he maintains that we are all agreed about certain particular things, that we should all rejoice to see idiocy, imbecility, syphilis, and alcoholism rooted out, and that it is more humane to achieve this end by restraints on marriage than by leaving the unfortunate victim of an hereditary taint to die, while conversely it is not right to enable him to propagate the disease. In this limited field eugenic principles may, with suitable safeguards, find their application. Miss Dendy, who has devoted many years to the care of the feeble-minded—the class bordering on idiocy, but just above the line—believes that they do more to recruit the class of "unemployable" and to depress by their competition the economic status of the casual laborer than any other single cause. The weight of authority is on the side of the opinion that feeble-mindedness is largely an hereditary condition, and, if this is so, to provide permanent institutional care for this unhappy class, involving restrictions on marriage, would seem neither inhumane nor, if a suitably stringent definition of feeble-mindedness be laid down, an unjustifiable interference with liberty. The duty of refraining from marriage where there is a marked hereditary taint of very grave character, such as insanity, has long been recognised. So far as eugenics is merely emphasising this duty and seeking to extend and define it by some systematic research into heredity, it can only do good service.

It is when it sets its claims higher and seeks to dictate to the social reformer that it must be met by a very decisive reminder of its limitations. The race or the stock is not society. Society is a complex structure of institutions, laws, customs, religious beliefs, scientific theories, industrial, artistic, and literary traditions, the work of generations of men, handed on not so much by physical heredity as by social transmission from generation to generation. There is no reason to think that the vast changes, whether for good or for evil, that society in England or in Western Europe has gone through in the last century and a half is in the least degree attributable to simultaneous changes in the congenital characteristics of Englishmen or Europeans generally. On the contrary, biological changes are so slow and slight that to attribute any large proportion of modern social evolution to their operation would be wildly improbable. Social life has been rapidly changed by the development of thought, its application to industry, by the rise of political liberty, by the genesis of newer ideals of social justice. All these are the work of a succession of thinkers, of poets, statesmen, and men of action, who, in spite of all surface rivalry, aid one another by handing on from man to man the results won by each. Social movements, in short, are within wide limits independent of changes in racial characters. Social evolution is not racial evolution. Doubtless any improvement of the racial type must facilitate social progress. But to make the racial type the criterion of social progress is to invert the true relation. What is needed of the race is to be judged by the life of society. The danger of the inverted view is that social reforms destined to the noblest objects of succoring the weak and caring for the backward in the race may be thwarted by the argument that the loser has himself to blame, and that it is his stock that should be extirpated. The argument is an attractive counterpoise to the humanitarian considerations that make for social reform, and it is this which secures it a hearing. Quite unconsciously it lends apparent justification to what is hard and unjust in the existing order—as though hardness and injustice were not the worst and most anti-social of all qualities, far more destructive to society than mere feebleness. If indeed there were a chance that the eugenist would ever attempt to eliminate the stock of the Napoleons, great or small—the whole type of the hard, pushing, callously successful—he would draw nearer to the heart of social science. But this is the very last type to be chosen for elimination. It is much if society can prevent the brazen pot from crushing the porcelain. So far as it succeeds in doing so—that is, in preserving the nobler sort that ruthless individualism would eliminate—social justice is itself the deepest and most pervasive of eugenic influences.

THE IRISH SONG.

As the stork brings the babies in Germany, so the wild swan brings the people's songs; though sometimes it is a goose. "If you ask who made this song," says a ballad, "the answer is, 'Three grey geese and a white one.'" Or if the song tells of love, the nightingale is its messenger. In England we dare not trust to things so transitory as birds, but to secure a steady supply of poetry we endow a Poet Laureate. Besides the laurel crown, we bestow on him an annual pipe of sherry, "to make him sing," as Plato said when, in his model State, he allowed old men a little wine. We support a vast leisured class for minor poets too, encouraging them to sing at their own expense; and there is Harry Lauder, whom we pay a hundred times more than the Laureate, because we like him a hundred times better. So, by one form of recompense or another, we ensure for ourselves the best poetry that money can buy.

But in Ireland the poet's case has been a little different. Certainly, her poets were always plentiful, and at one time they appear to have received some support from the upper classes. In the part of his "Itinerary" treating of Ireland in Elizabethan times, Fynes Moryson tells us so:—

> "The wild or mere Irish," he says, "have a generation of poets, or, rather, rhymers, vulgarly called bards, who, in their songs, used to extol the most bloody licentious men, and no others, and to allure the hearers, not to the love of religion and civil manners, but to outrages, robberies, living as outlaws, and contempt of the magistrates and King's laws. Alas! how unlike unto Orpheus, who, with his sweet harp and wholesome precepts of poetry"—and so on.

Through Moryson's English eyes we get just that glimpse of the Irish poets at a time when, like their country, they had fallen from their highest estate, and were no longer the honored singers of national greatness, though still welcome in the homes of the surviving princes of clans because they sang of war and daring and defiance of the foreign rule. He gives another reason for their position and influence:—

> "The mere Irish," he says, "howsoever they understand not what is truly honorable, yet out of barbarous ignorance are so affected to vain glory, as they nothing so much fear the Lord-Deputy's anger as the least song or balled those rascals might make against them, the singing whereof, to their reproach, would more have daunted them than if a judge had doomed them to the gallows."

Satire has always remained one of the Irish singer's powers, and "to put a song upon you" one of his most terrible threats. But the havoc and devastation that accompanied England's Imperial rule for two and a half centuries after Elizabeth's accession still further reduced the dignity of the poets by destroying the great Irish houses in which their language could be understood. It was thus that the Irish singers became in the finest sense popular poets, wandering through the country with harps that led the soul of music in dim hovels among the bogs and mountains. Like the prophets of old, having the compensation of song, they were often blind, and, always in destitution, they sang from village to village at other people's expense, as none of our minor poets can. The names of one or two out of the most distinguished have come down to us. Such were Carolan, whose harp still lives, and Raftery, who was singing a hundred years ago, and made this answer to a stranger, as Lady Gregory translates:—

> "I am Raftery the poet, full of hope and love; with eyes without light, with gentleness without misery.
>
> "Going west on my journey with the light of my heart; weak and tired to the end of my road. I am now, and my back to a wall, playing music to empty pockets."

Such, we suppose, was Hanrahan the Red, and, of a later time, Michael Moran, who, like Raftery, could not see a stim, but sang in Dublin streets till just before the Famine, and has his place in Mr. Yeats's "Celtic Twilight." He it was who made a poem on Moses, and a parody on the same beginning:—

> "In Egypt's land, contagious to the Nile,
> King Pharaoh's daughter went to bathe in style.
> She tuk her dip, then walked unto the land,
> To dry her Royal pelt, she ran along the strand.
> A bulrush tripped her, whereupon she saw
> A smiling babby in a wad o' straw.
> She tuk it up, and said, with accents mild:
> 'Tare-and-agers, girls, which av yez owns the child?'"

But it is seldom that the names of the singers have survived. They led an obscure and unrecorded life, singing their country's language, unknown to the foreigners who set the fashion of polite literature, and haunting the cloudy wastes and sunset estuaries where the followers of foreign culture never cared to penetrate. We know little of them beyond the remaining words and tunes, which have passed into the general heart of their people, bringing with them almost the only spiritual blessing of existence to the poor. They were the three grey birds and a white one who made the songs of Ireland. Many of those songs, and especially of the tunes, were memories from older and more splendid times, but the true Irish "folk-songs" seem chiefly to have arisen in those centuries of the country's blackest misery, and they ended abruptly as the song of a bird when it is shot, in the great famine of sixty years ago. As has happened in other countries, those who cared to preserve them came all but too late for their task. It was actually during the famine years and the ten years after that the fullest collections were made, by Dr. George Petrie and William Forde. But since then, as is well known, the great national work has been carried on by a band of patriots, of whom Dr. Douglas Hyde, An Craoibhin Aoibhin, founder of the Gaelic League, is chief.

High as the service of many others has been, perhaps, after all, the Irish song and music owe most to Dr. P. W. Joyce, who has recorded his memories from days of boyhood in the Ballyhoura mountains, far away back before the famine came. He has now issued a new collection of nearly a thousand unpublished songs and dances, about half of them noted down by himself, and the remainder by William Forde and John Edward Pigot. It is called "Old Irish Folk Music and Songs" (Hodges, Figgis & Co., Dublin, and Longmans, London), and is mainly a record of the music, especially of old reels, jigs, and hornpipes, though in some cases the words of the old songs are given, and we only wish they could have been given in all. Even the songs that were composed in a kind of English to the old Irish tunes are worth preserving, sometimes for a charm of feeling, and nearly always as a proof how impossible it is for a poet to use any tongue but his mother's with complete mastery.

Dr. Joyce tells us that about 3,000 of the Irish airs have now been printed, and he can put his hand on as many more still in manuscript. It is a great heritage for any nation, and a great defence for those who are trying to exclude from Ireland the corruption of the English music-halls and the abomination of the stage Irish songs that are thought so funny in London suburbs. But we cannot here treat of the music, beyond noticing that Dr. Joyce thinks it is usually taken too slow, for he regards its real character as rapid and spirited rather than melancholy. The Irish music, in fact, has both characters, just as the songs have both, though scholars and living Irish poets have dwelt chiefly on the melancholy side. There was nothing melancholy in the songs for "hauling home the bride"; nor in the adventures of Valentine O'Hara, who made a great sum of money when he took to the road, but "lost it all in a sudden death at Tyburn"; nor in the satirical ballads such as Moryson had heard of, and of which Dr. Joyce gives two examples, known to him in boyhood; nor about the songs of splendor that Lady Gregory says the old people in Irish workhouses love the best—the tales of castles with crowns over the doors, and lovers' flights on the backs of eagles, and music-loving water-witches, and journeys to the other world, and sleeps that last for seven hundred years; nor, again, in the song that Raftery made for a wedding feast, when there was not a bit but bread and herrings in the house, and he made a great song about the grand feast they had, and he put every sort of thing into the song—all the beef that was in Ireland; and he went to the Claddagh, and did not leave a fish in the sea. And there was no one at all at the wedding; but he brought all the bacachs and poor men in Ireland, and gave them a pound each. He went to bed after, without them giving him a drop to drink, as Lady Gregory also tells in her account of him; but he did not mind that, when they had not got it to give.

Or if we want the peculiar passion that some people call the Celtic note, we have but to turn to the Love Songs of Connacht:—

> "She is my treasure, oh! she is my treasure, the woman of the grey eye, she like the rose, a woman who would not place a hand beneath my head, a woman who would not go with me for gold.
>
> "She is my secret love, oh! she is my secret love, a woman who tells me nothing, a woman who would not breathe a sigh after me, a woman who would not for me shed tears."

Or we may remember once more that finest of West Irish songs, called "The Grief of a Girl's Heart," that begins:—

> "O Donall og, if you go across the sea, bring myself with you, and do not forget it; and you will have a sweetheart for fair days and market days, and the daughter of the King of Greece beside you at night.
>
> "It is late last night, the dog was speaking of you; the snipe was speaking of you in her deep marsh. It is you are the lonely bird through the woods, and that you may be without a mate until you find me."

When a country possesses such an inheritance as this, what wonder if its people insist that no one shall enter their national university who is so ignorant of their language as to be excluded from its wealth? The wonder is that any such regulation should be needed or thought of. It would be very hard, one supposes, for an Englishman who could only speak Danish to matriculate in Oxford.

A REBEL.

"Cooped underneath the sky," says the author of "Faith," "like butterflies shut up by schoolboys under a finger-bowl, we can but flutter, or, if we fly, rise only to the middle of the glass. What we can do is to look out as far as possible through the imprisoning crystal, and set down what we see." Mr. Cunninghame Graham has always possessed a gift of vision beyond that of most men, and a power of "setting down what we see" which can reveal vision to others. Everywhere, in his adventure through the world, he can appreciate and convey the sense of places: the sharp color and scent of them, in external impression extraordinarily vivid and memorable. In these sketches, "Faith," (Duckworth & Co.), he is now in some white dead, hot Spanish town, now in the ocean of the South American pampas, now again riding through the rain in the grey mist of a Scottish evening, or watching London celebrating its feast of Christmas. In all there is the impression of one who looks on at the wonder and the terror of all passing things, without dogmatism, without questioning, certainly without search for an end, watching the panorama go by not without some ironical smile at the noise and fuss and self-importance of each who frets and struts his hour upon the stage, and then is seen no more. He has no kind of approval for all or any of it. The South in its cruelties and squalors exhibits a more lively picturesqueness. The North in its laborious effort at accumulation only manifests a machine-like world devoid alike of fascination and adventure. The crowd, trampling through miry ways, is pressing forward towards aimless or ignoble ends, flattered, cajoled, exploited by the greedy and the cunning. Here is no conception of attainment, no judgment of the present by any imaginary future, no belief that effort towards improvement is worth the making. Many of the characters in these sketches are exhibited as standing out, serene and absurd, from the grey background of undistinguished lives, because in the midst of those who drift purposeless through a mechanical or an animal existence, they have found for themselves some fantastic or irrational goal. And in each case this goal is something near insanity, that life which we fools count but madness, and death but utter destruction. "A Saint," which first appeared in the columns of The Nation, is a summary of a shambling, ineffective life commencing and terminating in Cadiz: in which "in the soft, wind-swept, sea-lapped town where stars come out like fireflies, pale, and sink back into the sky, and where day melts into the night as imperceptibly as if it were a tide, it is so easy to forget." Into one shabby soul of that gay Southern people there came "an indignation which lasted all his life and did not settle down into that careless acquiescence that makes cowards of us all." Independent of the world, he set out on his career "to redress injustices, make things grown crooked straight, and, generally, to court the martyrdom mankind is ever to inflict on all who do not put their necks beneath its yoke." He becomes an anarchist, leading an austere life, avoiding all earth's bountiful pleasures, shunned as 'Antichrist' as he walked through the streets "dressed in his threadbare suit of shoddy Barcelona tweed, a soft grey hat upon his head, with his weak eyes shaded by neutral tinted spectacles." Most of his subsequent life is spent in prisons: he emerges from the last of them, a hero. His funeral is a popular demonstration. "He was a Saint. Long live Anarchy. Long live the Social Revolution" is the epitaph spoken at his funeral. "The ground was beaten in upon the grave, on which the blows of mattock and of spade fell heavily, just as the blows of fortune had descended all his life on the man resting underneath. The crowd dispersed and in an hour once more the town had taken on again its air of emptiness, and in the streets the women walked singing and balancing upon their hips, just as a square-rigged vessel sways and balances, with a light leading wind."

So Mr. Cunninghame Graham looks out upon the tragic comedy of life; finding it sometimes pitiful and sometimes absurd, and always vastly interesting. He is a rebel always; against that summarised selfishness of the timid majority which is termed Law and Order, on the side of the individual against the crowd of men, and its enslavement by custom and routine. He seeks color, zest, sparkle, enthusiasm, however bizarre and whimsical; as in the old Socialist bill-poster, whose joy it was to print on yellow packing paper scurrilous attacks on the Queen, "which he placed upon his daily round in letter-boxes of houses of the rich." Long ago "his bills have been covered over an inch thick with others, his pot of paste turned mouldy, his brushes worn down to the wood, and he himself safely enfeoffed in the possession of the inheritance to which he had been born, a pauper's funeral and grave." But "when I sometimes look on his life's work in literature," adds Mr. Cunninghame Graham, "the pamphlet 'Messalina' in which poor Queen Victoria is both so roundly and unjustly vilified, and think upon the pleasure that, no doubt, the writer had in its production in his one stuffy room in Drury Lane, it is not always easy to be sure if one should laugh or cry." The whole panorama—not more inspiring and, perhaps, not more intelligible at the last than the effort of this happy madman—also seems to leave this writer in similar doubt; whether at the end of the story "one should laugh or cry."

Mr. Cunninghame Graham was once in Parliament as a "Socialist." In company with William Morris and

Mr. John Burns he fought the police in Trafalgar Square for "the right of public meeting." He may not have seen the humor of it yesterday. He certainly can see the humor of it to-day. William Morris, indeed, as his biographer has declared, always had something of the appearance of Christian in Vanity Fair; finding it so difficult to understand "why the story of the world grows so unworthy." He entered on a campaign to convert a society which he found just bearable into a society which he would have found intolerable, with the gravity and devotion of a crusader; and wore out his life, "a martyr to his effort for Socialism." It is difficult to believe that Mr. Cunninghame Graham, with his quick insight and gift of irony, ever shared in these illusions. He must have known from his revolt against the meannesses and compromises of comfort that a society organised on the basis of comfort, that autocratic, economically efficient machine which alone "Socialism" can attain, was a monster against which he would have been in perpetual warfare. But the thing presented itself to him (it would seem) as an adventure. At least, it was an attack upon the accepted order, an assertion of the will of the few against the many. And adventure, of some color and violence, is for him a justification of the life of the world. The characters in these sketches all have "faith" in a variety of false or brutal gods. And this "faith" alone enables them to go through the world, riding in scarlet amid a crowd in dingy grey, with lights on the horizon, and the sound of music on the wind. Where this individual will is allowed free play —in his South American sunlit spaces, with passion never far from the surface, amongst his Moors in Morocco, even in the little republic Andorra, here so charmingly described —this writer finds still surviving some trace of a life which is itself its own vindication. It is all disappearing before the advance of a civilisation in which the cohesion of a thousand small, mean lives (in his vision) is trampling down all variations from the normal, is rolling like a moving swamp over the variegated plain. And he would be prepared to cry over it if it were not all so ridiculous: the grave seriousness, the owlish wisdom with which men deliberately set themselves to make a mess of their lives.

Add to such an outlook a power of charm in style, and a delight in sensuous impression, and you are happy in possession of writing alike provocative and compelling, a joy in possession. Mr. Cunninghame Graham shares with William Morris that love of the earth and its beauty which may come at last, in some future "Age of Order," to be the last anarchic stimulus amongst a humanity entangled in a gigantic machine. In a score of tiny sketches here is emphasised this ever-returning miracle of the earth's glories: of the Campagna in the sunset, with "the great sad plains turned to a sheet of silver, the hills to fire, the decaying relics of the past to palaces": in the hot summer of Avila, amongst the "tortuous cobbled streets, past medieval houses, by little plazas in which acacias grew": or in winter at Lochen Falloch with "the little black loch, just as it was intended that it should be lost, by Nature, when she hid it in the hills." One half of the man is revealed in his "Christmas week in London," with its passionate and bitter revolt against the injustice and squalor of modern life; judged and condemned by the legend ironically proclaimed from the churches of a dead creed. "In this Christmas week, with its fierce cold and misery to thousands, mocked by false protestations of the brotherhood of man, and pinched with hunger in the midst of wealth, it must have seemed that all the legend was but another of the corpse-candles lighted to set them running after its thin flame." The other half is revealed in the end of a journey, when he recognises that it is none of his business to interfere with the madness of peoples. "Next morning saw me early on the road, riding along and smoking, musing contentedly on this thing and that, upon the fall of nations and of kings, creeds, principalities and powers, and why it is that fate had spared Andorra when it had eaten up Greece, Rome, and Babylon, and also on the various ways in which men pass their lives struggling to do things quite impossible to do, when after all nothing is better than to jog along the road and shout 'Arré' loudly now and then, when a mule lags behind."

THE "YES" OF JESUS.

One of the characteristic features of St. Paul's writing is its spontaneity. The quickness with which he writes, and his swift seizure of the passing thought, without injury to the train of ideas, are remarkable, when we reflect how well-knit his written work is. The personality implied by such work—logical, brilliant, sympathetic, above all, quick and incisive—is familiar to us. It has done more for us than we realise, in shaping ourselves both directly and through those who, century after century, have done most for the church—Augustine, Luther, Bunyan, Wesley, and how many more?

The brilliance and value of his tangent thoughts is very great. In writing to the Corinthians, for example, Paul is explaining that his failure to visit them was not a matter of impulse or levity. He is not, he says, of the "Yea, Yea, and Nay, Nay" type—Yes at one moment and No the next. As he writes the words, they suddenly flash another suggestion upon him. The real thing that gives a man stability is his centre of gravity, and Jesus Christ was not "Yea and Nay." Very far from it; and he writes: "In him was Yes. For however many the promises of God are, in him is the Yes; so, too, by him is the Amen to God's glory through us."

Christ as the "Yes" of God, is his thought, not a mere accidental thought, though due in this connection to a tangential movement of the rapid mind. For with Paul, Christ is essentially positive and affirmative. A promise is a poor half of a thing till the fulfilling Yes comes; and Christ, he says, in just this way gives worth and meaning to the promises of God. For these, of course, we instinctively look to the Old Testament, for so the Church has taught us to do, ever since it took to refuting the Jew in the second century. But this is neither in accordance with modern canons of historical study, nor with the method of Jesus in handling scripture. If we follow his lines we shall reach something better than any scheme of proof-texts compiled to confute a Jew.

What is the value of the prophets according to Jesus? They were men loyal to fact, men who touched fact and lived up against it, till they understood it. They and he alike lived in the region of fact and found God there. Prophets, we fancy, deal in futurity; but they never make much of it until they have absorbed the present a great deal more thoroughly than the practical people round about them. The prophets of Israel in this way read the future out of the present, God's future revelations out of his actual ones. Here was Man, a poor creature enough, except for one thing—his consciousness of his poverty, which differentiated him at once from animals, from natural laws, and all the complete and content things the world may hold. As a man tightened his grip upon fact, he realised more and more acutely how little he had, how little he was, and how much he must have and must be, before he could be complete and content. Fact, which is the real handwriting of God, if one reads it closely enough, shows us in God's script how restless and incomplete a thing is man. Sorrow and hope, love and wrong, and life robbed of its children—all that the English poet has summed up as > "Infinite passion and the pain

> Of finite hearts that yearn—"

these were the letters of God's tracing in the human soul, and the prophets read them slowly, one by one, and construed them into a glorious promise. And of this promise, of all conceivable promises of the kind, however many they are, Christ, according to Paul, is the fulfilment, the Yes.

The early church is a witness to Paul in this matter, for of all men the primitive Christian was in closest touch with the horrible facts of life, and was, at the same time, the happiest of all beings. "The holy spirit," wrote Hermas, "is a glad spirit"; one might even translate the term "gay," for the Greek is the original root-word whence "ex-hilar-ation" and its cognates come. God, in fact, had fulfilled His promises to man in Jesus of Nazareth. This was the common experience. What is much more to the point, it is still verified, whenever men will take Jesus at his word, and really believe what he says. Then comes the great simplification. God is no longer darkness, problem, or "Grand Perhaps"; He becomes love and light, and our eternal rest, while we find Jesus himself the way, the truth, and the life, the light of the world. The author of the fourth Gospel would never have written all these things down, sixty years after the crucifixion, if they had been mere untested fancies; they were experiences of a peculiarly bomb-proof kind. Think through what the early Christian was carried by his conviction! Think only of one picture which Tertullian draws—the Christian tied to the stake in the arena, a crowd of cruel faces all around him, an unspeakable din of howling voices, and he has to wait how long? How long would it seem? All this Tertullian had seen, and he expected no less for himself. God's promises need a powerful Yes, if they are to carry a man through the minutes of such an experience, through the years of such an expectation.

But let us turn to Jesus himself. What better name is there for him than God's Yes? How he lived among God's affirmations, blinking none and shirking none! Other men taught by negatives. "Thou shalt not" is the ancient path to holiness. Jew and Gentile lived on taboos and make-believes; they forbade marriage, food, society, to their holy man; in a word (borrowed from a witty foreign critic of Oxford), "they cultivated fastidiousness and called it holiness." But for Jesus everything natural was of God's making and ordaining, and he said Yes to it, to human love of wife and child, to manual labor, to every rough and ready fact in the world; and he is still saying it.

Paul goes further when he speaks of the Amen. This was one of the "words of Jesus." "Familiar in his mouth," it was remembered by his friends, and when they used it they thought of him irresistibly: "that is what he used to say!" It passed very early into the common worship on the Lord's day. "Can you with that mouth, whence you utter the Amen, cheer for a gladiator?" asked Tertullian. It was a reminiscent word. Paul sweeps down upon its original meaning. It is by Jesus, he says, that we say Jesus' own word "Truly" to God—to God's glory, too, he adds. "Amen" is the real "Hallelujah," Jesus' version of the ritual word for every-day use. It is the real Christian confession, and it implies the true mind of the church, open as the mind of Jesus to all fact, to every human experience and every human sympathy, to all new learning and all new discovery of God's ways and words—the mind in love with God's realities, whether laws of Nature or sons of men, co-operative with God and man in the spirit of Jesus. This is Paul's conception of religion—a great affirmation in the power of the greatest Yes of all.

"The collective name for the ripe fruits of religion in a character is Saintliness," says Professor William James in his most famous book; and one of its most distinctive features is, he says, "a shifting of the emotional centre towards loving and harmonious affections, towards 'yes, yes,' and away from 'no,' where the claims of the non-ego are concerned." St. Paul did not use exactly the language of the modern psychologist; but one can imagine his reading the passage from which these words have been taken, and then, if it were his way to recall what he had himself written, he might remember what he had said to the Corinthians about the Yes and the Amen. But more probably he would forget the epistle and "The Varieties of Religious Experience" alike, and rise to some new thought of intenser happiness in the original Centre of all his happiness.

Contemporaries.

MR. TAFT.

Mr. Taft belongs to the best type of American public men—a type that, at its best, is far better than most Europeans, or, for the matter of that, most Americans, quite realise. In England the material rewards, the social distinction, the consciousness of sustaining a great tradition, the power and kudos that belong to a man who reaches high office, are in themselves potent inducements to enter the service of the State. But an American Cabinet Minister knows little of these seductions. He is underpaid; the attractions of Washington in winter, though indisputable, can hardly be considered an overwhelming incitement to public life; the national interest in his actions and his personality lacks something of respectfulness, and soon becomes an intolerable nuisance; being chosen for his post by the President, he has no guarantee of a secure tenure; the sharp division between the Executive and the Legislature makes it improbable that, when out of office, he will continue to be a power even in his own party, much less in the life of the nation; and, being merely an administrator, and not, like Cabinet Ministers in England, administrator and legislator combined, he has few opportunities of writing his policies on the statute-book. Yet in spite of these disadvantages an American President has rarely much difficulty in recruiting a body of public servants who are nowhere surpassed in efficiency and devotion to public interests. Many of them are poor men, without private means, who have voluntarily abandoned high professional ambitions to serve their country on salaries that are not merely inadequate, but indecently so. There is not one of them who could not, if he chose, earn outside Washington from ten to twenty times the income on which he economises as a State official. There is not one of them who is not constantly assailed by offers of positions in the world of commerce, finance, and the law, that would satisfy every material ambition with which he began life. But these men rise clear above the commercialised ideals which the great bulk of their fellow-countrymen subscribe to unquestioningly. They are content to sink themselves in the national service without a thought of private advancement. Both in spirit and in fact Mr. Taft is an admirable specimen of this, the real aristocracy of America. His career has been a succession of renunciations of professional and personal ambitions in obedience to the call for State service.

The rhetorician is often the weakness of democracy; the practical, dependable man, if he has a heart, is its strength. Mr. Taft belongs as emphatically to the latter as Mr. Bryan to the former class. He is nothing of an orator, and still less of a genius. There is a wholesome lack of originality about him; his mental processes can all be watched and calculated. One would not look to Mr. Taft for any very striking contribution to the philosophy of politics, any more than one would expect him to bubble forth in epigrams. He is not a man of wide reading or of diversified intellectual interests, and he appears to have as little of Mr. Roosevelt's many-sidedness as of his electrifying alertness and his somewhat volcanic temperament. But his qualities, if not of a brilliant order, are strong, genuine, and serviceable. He has amassed a store of all-round experience on the Bench, in the Philippines, at the War Office, in Cuba, on the Isthmus, and in casual diplomatic visits to Tokyo, Rome, and St. Petersburg, such, perhaps, as no previous President has equalled; and, like Cobden, he is one of those men on whom no experience is wasted. He is always learning, and whatever he learns he learns thoroughly. Immersed all his life in the intimate direction of affairs, he has shown a peculiar gift of lubricating sagacity and that kind of impersonal, disentangling mind which, when united with a winning personality and a character that all men trust, makes its possessor a court of final appeal for private friends and public colleagues. He moves on an even keel; his centre of gravity is a fixed point. The judge and the man of affairs seem to have joined hands in him; the reflective and probing mind is linked with a strong and constant bias for practical business. Moreover, it is a good omen for the political peace of his administration that Mr. Taft should possess the serenity of a comfortable, unworrying man, who is master of himself, who has learned the virtue of a careful patience, who never explodes, and who allows nothing to flurry him or to break through his reserves of genial placidity. Everybody, indeed, appears to be drawn towards this good-humored, unconventional, rollicking giant, with his frank, free bearing, his massive look of power and adequacy, his radiating air of jollity and zest. He has earned, too, the reputation of being honest, where few men are honest—in his politics. Indeed, it is hardly too much to say that his politics are comprised in saying straight out precisely what he thinks. As a Presidential candidate he showed a refreshing scorn for the time-serving manœuvres, the intimate deals and propitiations, that the politicians expected him to practise. He could not be a demagogue if he tried. The arts of trimming and quibbling, of hedging and pretending, are as alien to his character as they were to Grover Cleveland's.

From such a man America expects, first of all, peace. We do not mean external peace—that is taken as a matter of course—but internal peace, peace between the White House and Congress, and between the President and the world of business and finance. After the tub-thumping and wild alarms of the Roosevelt régime, the people are prepared to listen to the voice of reasoned persuasion. They do not desire to see the Roosevelt policies either abandoned or reversed, or any intermission in the campaign against plutocratic privilege. That the natural resources of the country are to be conserved, that a way must be found of asserting the supremacy of public over private interests and of legalising industrial combinations, and at the same time of bringing them under effective Federal supervision—all this is common ground. But there is a feeling, strongest, of course, in Wall-street, but discernible also among the mass of the people, that Mr. Roosevelt's too aggressive and spectacular methods have served their turn, and that it is for Mr. Taft to continue the work of readjustment and reform with the minimum of disturbance to business stability. The task is one congenial both to the new President's views and to his personality, and the moral upheaval which Mr. Roosevelt brought about with so much turmoil and friction may easily, under the mellower direction of his successor, bear fruit in legislation that will be passed and accepted unanimously.

There is, however, one contentious matter which Mr. Taft is both pledged and determined to tackle, and which his predecessor, with more prudence than statesmanship, consistently passed by—the matter of tariff revision. The Republicans are committed to a reduction of the present schedules, and Mr. Taft, by summoning a special session of Congress, has shown that he means, if he can, to keep them to their word. It will be a matter of the first political interest to see whether he succeeds. He is both helped and hindered by the realised deficit of some £24,000,000 on the current year and the estimated deficit for 1910 of £32,000,000. He is helped by the argument that a reduction of duties means an increase of revenue; he is hindered by the opposite argument that the deficit can and should be met, with little or no disturbance to existing rates, by imposing a small ad valorem duty on articles that are at present on the free list. We have not much faith in a revision of the tariff conducted by its friends and beneficiaries; nor do we greatly trust the Democrats, least of all those from the new industrial South, to uphold in Congress their platform protestations in favor of a tariff for revenue only. If Mr. Taft really secures any reductions that are not more than offset by increases in other directions, no further proof will be needed of his skill in managing men and of the peaceful successes that are likely to distinguish his Presidency.

The Drama.

MR. GALSWORTHY ARRIVES.

Everybody connected with the production of "Strife" at the Duke of York's Theatre is to be congratulated, and first and foremost Mr. Charles Frohman. He has shown insight, courage, open-mindedness in accepting Mr. Galsworthy's play, and enabling Mr. Granville Barker to revive in St. Martin's Lane the spirit, the atmosphere, the "char-rum" of Sloane Square. So I take leave to say "Bravo, Mr. Frohman!" Then again, as one notes after the names of four of the chief actors, "By kind permission of Miss Lena Ashwell," one feels that Mr. Frohman is not the only manager to be congratulated. By her liberality in conceding the services of her best artists, the manageress of the Kingsway Theatre has once more proved that her compact little company is an artistic organisation of which she, and we, may well be proud. So I permit myself to add, "Brava, Miss Ashwell!"

But the essence of the matter is, of course, "Bravissimo, Mr. Galsworthy!" Not long ago, in a few remarks I had occasion to make on the new school of dramatists, I said that Mr. Galsworthy was still something of "a dark horse." He is so no more. He has proved his staying power, and is manifestly one of the best horses in the stable. There was in "The Silver Box," and still more in "Joy," a certain insubstantiality that left one in doubt as to the author's power of handling a big subject. They were exceedingly clever, but their scale was small. "Strife," on the other hand, is distinctly a big thing. Both technically and intellectually it cuts a deep furrow. It would not surprise me if the historian of the English drama were to pick out last Tuesday's performance as one of the three or four events of the decade that distinctly marked a stage of progress.

Just as "The Silver Box" in some measure recalled "Der Biberpelz," it is inevitable that in thinking of "Strife"—which might better, perhaps, have been frankly entitled "The Strike"—one should also think of "Die Weber." But the plays are really to be contrasted rather than compared. Hauptmann's drama is a broad historical picture, crowded with realistic detail. It dates from his Zolaesque period, though one may note, too, a strain of Russian influence in the wise, patient, pious old man whom a stray bullet kills at his loom. In Mr. Galsworthy's play there is not a trace of "naturalism," and it would scarcely be a paradox to say that it is not even realistic. True, there is not a word that is not perfectly real and natural. There is not the slightest concession either to conventional stage requirements on the one hand, or to quasi-poetic symbolism on the other. And yet the whole play produces a symbolic effect, or rather is, in itself, a symbol. Superficially it is a picture, just, and sober, and delicate in every stroke; but fundamentally it is the utterance, the embodiment, of a thought. Where Hauptmann piles up brutalities and agonies, and appeals in an almost physical sense to our bowels of compassion, Mr. Galsworthy gives us the irreducible minimum of sordid and painful detail—only such a specimen of suffering, in fact, as shall enable us to imagine the rest. It would have been easy to surround Mrs. Roberts with hollow-eyed, famished children, struggling for nauseous morsels of food; as it is, the absence of children from her home—the home of the intelligent working-man—is one of the grim and ominous features of the picture. The only child whom we actually see, plays on a pipe and is fed with bread and jam. Nor, in the personal relations between employers and employed, do we see any callous brutality: there is no insolent manager or tyrannous foreman. Any such incidental evil, due to defects of individual character, would only be an irrelevant complication of the case, as Mr. Galsworthy views it. What he aims at is the confrontation of two principles in their stark simplicity, or, as Lamb would say, their quiddity, divested of all inessential and corrigible accidents. Thus the play attains an extraordinary purity and distinction of outline. There is nothing cheap, nothing obvious, nothing anecdotic or sensational about it. What it gives us is the intellectual essence of a characteristic conflict of modern life, without either harrowing our nerves or making any facile appeal to our superficial sympathies. While strictly dramatic, without a word which betrays the author in masquerade, it is, nevertheless, as I said above, the embodiment of a thought.

And what is this thought? What but the wastefulness, the futility, the ultimate impossibility of the system which leaves the distribution of the products of industry to be regulated by periodical trials of endurance between the pockets of the rich and the stomachs of the poor? "Strife" is, I take it, a reduction to absurdity—to tragic absurdity—of the theory that capitalism can co-exist with personal liberty. John Anthony, the stern old survivor from the days of triumphant individualism, is perfectly right in maintaining that the relation between Capital and Labor, as at present organised, is inevitably one of strife; that it is cant to pretend that their interests are identical; and that every concession made to the proletariat is a prelude to further demands and a betrayal of the interests of the capitalist class, as such. What he fails to realise, or at at any rate to admit to himself, is that the mere coercion of hunger is insufficient to keep labor in what he regards as its place. It has two strong allies in the camp of capitalism itself. On the one hand it has humanitarian sentiment, which cannot serenely accept the torture of women and children as a mere negligible incident of class-warfare. On the other hand it has cupidity, or, in many cases, the actual pinch of poverty, among shareholders, who will rather put up with a slight diminution in their dividends than sacrifice them altogether, and see their property indefinitely depreciate, for the eventual benefit of their class as a whole. There is more capacity for sacrifice and endurance in the suffering class than in the enjoying; wherefore so long as the workman is at liberty to starve if he pleases, the battle is ultimately an uneven one. Nothing but the conversion of mere wage-slavery into actual serfdom, enforced at the bayonet's point, could give John Anthony a permanent victory, and that a very expensive one. Meanwhile the battle is not only cruel, but enormously and senselessly wasteful; and yet nothing but a radical reconstruction of the framework of society can definitely put an end to it. So I read, not exactly the lesson of "Strife," but rather the thought that informs it. I find in it an austere and impressive symbol of the ultimate impossibility of our economic system.

Mr. Galsworthy's technique is extremely characteristic and interesting. Its ruling principle is the sedulous avoidance of theatricalism. Even the most innocent tricks of emphasis are to him snares of the Evil One. He would sooner die than drop his curtain, I will not say on a tableau, but even on an effective line. It is his chief ambition that you should never discern any arrangement, any intention, in his work—that you should never find him out in a concession, or an appeal, to the tastes or habitual expectations of his audience. As a rule, the only reason you can see for his doing thus or thus is his desire that you should be able to see no reason for it. Yet his conduct of the action is never eccentric or arbitrary: what is said or done is always perfectly natural and probable, and the interest is steadily maintained—at some points almost breathlessly—without our feeling conscious that any speech or incident is in the slightest degree conditioned by the thought of its effect on an audience. I do not say that this is the only right method of technique; I do not even profess a passionate admiration for it; but it is extremely interesting and well-sustained. The danger of it is that you may become affectedly unaffected, artificially inartificial.

I shall not attempt the ungracious and, to me, impossible task of ranging in any order of merit the many admirable performances given by the long roll of actors. Mr. Norman McKinnell and Mr. Fisher White, as the protagonists of Capital and Labor respectively, fairly shared the honors of the occasion; but Mr. White's was the more difficult task, and perhaps the more brilliantly successful. The most moving moment of the play, and an extraordinarily fine one, was that in which the two embittered antagonists, both beaten, both humiliated, bow to each other in mutual recognition of baffled bravery. Mr. Dennis Eadie, Mr. Hallard, Mr. Hignett, Mr. Edmund Gwenn, Mr. O. P. Heggie were all as good as possible; and the same may be said of Miss Ellen O'Malley, Miss Mary Barton, and Miss Lillah McCarthy, except that, in the two working women, one might have wished, if not for dialect, at any rate for a little less distinction of speech.

Mr. Galsworthy's method is thrown into relief by a comparison of "Strife" with "The Head of the Firm"—a clever play adapted by Mr. Leslie Faber from the Danish of Hjalmar Bergström, and produced at the Vaudeville Theatre. Here again we are concerned with the conflict of capital and labor; but here it is a mere background or starting-point for a domestic drama working itself out in the capitalist's family. The first two acts of the play are remarkably clever; but unfortunately their promise is scarcely fulfilled in the last two, in which the development becomes conventional and the idea obscure. The play comes out, in the end, as a satire upon the attempts of humanitarianism to mitigate the rigors of class-warfare. If that was the author's idea (I really am not clear on the point) some hint of it ought to have been vouchsafed at an earlier stage. The piece, however, is interesting throughout, and is capitally acted by Mr. Faber, Mr. Beveridge, Mr. James Hearn, Miss Henrietta Watson, and Miss Ethelwyn Jones. The most interesting characters, however, are episodic—the workman's widow, Mrs. Dalby, and her amiable son. These two parts are quite brilliantly played by Miss Sydney Fairbrother and Mr. Evelyn Beerbohm.

William Archer.

Short Sketch.

THE PARENT AND CHILD OF TO-DAY.

Long ago parents used to have a kind of monopoly of being in the right. It was an article of faith in the nursery that a parent could never do wrong. It was a heavenly position! Parents were never told to get up at an unearthly hour, nor to brush their teeth, nor to wash their hands, nor to comb their hair. They always had the best of everything and not a word was said. Even when they said things that were not strictly true and were found out—which is, of course, the only sin—they were never thumped and sent to bed. But in this new era, though parents still enjoy some nominal privileges, they are undoubtedly subjected to a new criticism in the infant department.

A friend once told me of a heart-rending experience of her own. Her dearest enemy came to call one day, and my friend's youngest, an artless thing of five, strayed into the room to entertain the guest until the arrival of her mother, and just as she opened the door she heard her remark in pleasant, conversational tones, "You're the lady papa thays he doethn't like." "You wicked little story-teller," and the agonised mother pounced down on her child and shook her, "how dare you tell such a naughty, wrong story! Go right to bed!" "He did!" and the wronged one burst into a flood of tears, "I heard him tell you, and you thaid you hoped she'd never come again. There!" Whereupon the infant martyr wailed herself out and left her suffering mother to explain.

Though the authority of parents has been distinctly shaken, they can still claim unreasonable immunity from punishment. When the family father spills soup over himself or the table-cloth, ma looks at him, but she says nothing. If a parent demands a second helping of tart, it is vouchsafed without unpleasant remarks. If mother breaks anything, the bits are discreetly removed, and, instead of "getting it," she is offered sympathy. Possibly she may say that she was careless, but nobody else would dare to, not even pa. It makes a young thing long to be a parent, if only to enjoy the blissful immunity from those consequences with which life is so packed.

The very young were at one time never in the right even when they were in the right, for to have conceded it would have given the authority of parents such a black eye. But now young things make up for it! And, after all, say what you will, there is no other pleasure so great. It is the height of epicurean enjoyment. But these days it has so ceased to be a monopoly of parents that one may truly say that the filial attitude is one of tolerant, if not impatient, criticism. The modern parent has resigned himself, as it were, to the spirit of the age, and has relinquished his old prerogative of being in the right, even if he wasn't, a prerogative painfully earned by length of days and experience and sorrow, and lets the young things, full of pathetic conceit, give him the benefit of their callow wisdom. It is a sad satisfaction to reflect that the cock-sureness of youth will be knocked out of them as soon as they, too, become modern parents.

Some of us can still remember in the old days seeing an elderly woman stand trembling in the presence of a little old mother who laid down the law. These days the power of old mother is curtailed, though not nearly so much as that of old father. In spite of holding the purse-strings, father never had the power to make one quake like old mother. Yesterday I passed a small girl having a tussle with a small boy, whose ears she boxed viciously, at the same time shrieking at the top of a shrill voice, "I'll tell my ma on you, see if I don't," as if she could menace him with nothing more terrible. Indeed, as a mere threat father was never in it. On the whole, I rejoiced to see that the female parent had not suffered a total eclipse. But, unfortunately, this was in a slum neighbourhood and so doesn't count. The present somewhat ignominious position of parents is due in a small measure to the American child, who has put them in their proper places with such great success that it has set the fashion for the whole world, with the exception of savage countries, where, it is painful to confess, parents are still parents and still have something to say.

It is instructive to observe that always to be in the right gets to be a matter of habit, in which one can educate one's family to believe. All that is necessary is a first-class opinion of oneself and an irritating obstinacy. Every family is blessed with some member who makes up the minds of the rest. Most people love to have their minds made up for them, and there is always one in a family ready to undertake that little job. And it is curious to observe how flabby a mind that won't make itself up becomes with want of exercise. Elderly parents are much afflicted in this way, but as a good many have cheque books instead of minds they answer just as well. How different is the attitude of parents towards their children and towards the public! I knew a very eminent critic who wielded an awful critical lash that made young literary aspirants writhe, but in his meek and private capacity as a mere parent he met a just retribution at the hands of a young daughter, who contradicted and snubbed him as only a child can contradict and snub a parent, and that in the presence of the same young poets, who used to venture in at tea-time, and whom the afflicted father had damned the day before in the columns of that great review whose mission it is to crush the aspiring.

It can be truly affirmed that domestic life, which was once a pleasing parental despotism, is now a republic, and the family motto is, "I know just as much as you." Once to be in the right used to be a kind of royal prerogative, but in these days even the divine right of kings has been so curtailed that there is hardly enough left to line a $7\frac{3}{4}$ royal crown, while years ago a king had enough to cover himself all over and heaps to spare for his poor relations. It adds to one's acute enjoyment of it that it is the only pleasure money cannot buy.

There have been two mistaken poets who made some valuable reflections on the pleasures of Hope and the pleasures of Memory. But it seems to me that Hope is a sadly uncertain quality in the future, not unconnected with disappointment, while Memory as an asset for pleasure has always struck me unfavorably. It deals, it is needless to say, with the past, and the past has a way of being past.

No, the only joy worth mentioning is always to be in the right or to think you are, which amounts to the same thing. Every family has a member so gifted, and very trying she usually is! I say "she" advisedly, because experience teaches that the being so divinely endowed is usually feminine. Indeed, apart from kings, who are born with the remains of it, I know of no other masculine creatures so endowed except the prophets. The prophets always were in the right and they always said so, and that annoyed everybody so much that they usually ended as martyrs. Now though the family prophet is almost more annoying, she unfortunately never ends as a martyr. The family does that.

What was so particularly trying about the old prophets was that they always prophesied something disagreeable, so, on the whole, one is glad that they have gone out of fashion as public characters, family prophets being quite bad enough. Then, too, it always seemed to me as if the old prophets got much more credit than they deserved, because it is very easy to prophesy something unpleasant, for it is so sure to happen. One can't help wishing that, for a change, a new race of prophets might arise, who would foretell all the nice things that are going to happen! How we should welcome a prophet who would proceed through Threadneedle and Lombard Streets and announce at the top of his voice that the American financial muddle was soon to be unmuddled, and that the Rand mines were about to announce an extra dividend, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, in the generosity of his heart, about to abolish the income tax! Or think of the rapture of Piccadilly if a venerable prophet were to pass through that famous thoroughfare and announce that in future no bald-headed man need despair, for a hair restorer was about to appear to whom no sufferer need appeal in vain. How the afflicted in clubs would rush to the windows and rejoice, for, lo! a prophet had arisen in Piccadilly who had come to tell them joyful tidings. What a happy life such an optimistic prophet would have! And no one would ever dream of making a martyr of him!

But the private family prophet is quite a different thing. Her motto is always, "I told you so," and very annoying it is. It puts her on a self-erected pedestal of wisdom which is most irritating. Nor is it fair to prophesy backwards, as she almost always does. For it really does not take so much inspiration to tell what has already happened as she seems to think! Indeed, to sit in peace and safety and tell of all the unpleasant things that are going to happen to some one else is in a way a pleasure, even if a melancholy one. So if the prophets were never very popular they were not without compensation. Estimable and kind though they always were, they might also have been somewhat disappointed if their prophecies had not come true. After all, human nature is human nature. Even the family prophet, usually an acidulated maiden aunt or an elder sister just beginning to ferment, is also human. But parents as prophets have long since been out of it. They gave it up when they gave up being in the right. The trouble is when parents venture to prophesy and it really happens—as it sometimes does—then they usually get nothing for their pains but a broken heart for themselves. For the modern child—even when grown up, if not elderly—has been known to turn on a broken-hearted prophet and say, "It's all your fault. Why did you let me?"

Sometimes when one sees a foolish, patient parent unmercifully snubbed by youth and inexperience, one wonders, seeing that there is a society for the protection of everything else in the world, if it isn't about time to start a society for the protection of parents.

MRS. JOHN LANE.

Letters to the Editor.

CONSCRIPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Assume that Lord Roberts and the members of the National Service League believe that compulsory service means—and will in the future mean—only what they claim it to mean—a very serious assumption when it is remembered that the largest number of its advocates belong to that class which will derive a direct advantage when the system is established. Why is it, then, so necessary to counter every naval move of Germany or of the United States by one at least as great, "plus ten per cent"? Why build Dreadnoughts, and man them as rapidly, in fear of falling behind in the race? If conscription is established and called "Universal Training," how long will it be before the Yellow Press and the military expert find that our soldier is but half-drilled, and bears no comparison with the German or French soldier or Japanese conscript? And certainly there will be no "ten per cent." to the good. Compulsory service in any form whatever will not, and cannot, fail to bring in its train urgent comparisons which will be so striking to the ignorant populace as to ensure a rapid and firm tightening of the grip of the professional soldier over the enslaved people which no present denial of intervention, or possibility, by Lord Roberts and his League can ever prevent. Moreover, the Yellow Press and the expert will be right in their advocacy, for if this nation departs from her custom and in any respect enters the lists, is it to be expected that her European, her Far Eastern, and her Western competitors will remain idle? But will they not set about ensuring their superiority in land forces, "plus ten per cent.," or strive to attain it?

Great Britain stands alone and invites no hostility. Her soldiers are free men, and fight as free men; and have never failed when properly led. Let the busy gentlemen who form the Service League and advocate its public and its private plans, look to themselves and be quite sure that while wearing the uniform of her late Majesty and of his Majesty the King, they have never failed to take full advantage of their position as officers, and by diligence, hard work, self-abnegation, have led our soldiers in war to victory. History will probably say that it will be time enough to entrust the freedom of our youth to their charge when they have demonstrated their complete fitness for the task. Meanwhile Mr. Haldane has found much to alter, and even more to correct, and much still remains to be done. Voluntary and compulsory service stand on a forked road, and the further you proceed, the wider apart becomes your interval. The roads never converge without a revolution.—Yours, &c.,

A. GRIMSHAW HAYWOOD.

March 7th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Colonel A. Grimshaw Haywood, does me the honor—and, I thank him—of not attempting to traverse the concluding words, which sum up the argument of my letter of the 20th ult., but it is difficult to see where treaties come into a question of the defence of these islands from invasion, unless he means that we are to exist on sufferance.

As to the method of providing a nation in arms, conscription embraces "the whole male population," according to the article "Army" in the "Encycl. Britt." (p. 566). Now, it is proposed to choose about one-third of "the whole male population," as they arrive at the age of eighteen, and that third the best available, according to a standard of fitness, quite independent of social status. Clearly then, the word "conscription," with its debased meaning, closely associated with drawing lots and with allowing substitutes, does not apply.

It was suggested by Colonel Alsager Pollock, on the 3rd ult., in a paper read to the United Wards Club of the City of London, that assuming compulsion to be necessary—"selection," not "conscription," should be employed. And this officer went on to say, according to the newspaper report, that "if only the best morally and physically were permitted to enjoy the honor of serving the King, as citizen defenders of their native land, it would soon come to be regarded as a misfortune to be disqualified on physical grounds, and as a lasting disgrace to be rejected as morally unfit."

This seems to be the right attitude.—Yours, &c.,

HERBERT M. WYATT,
Commander, R.N.

"Brighton," Waverley Road, Bournemouth,
March 6th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am, as Colonel Haywood (will he pray accept my apology for the accidental omission of his military title) surmises, a subscriber to the National Service League. I cannot, however, claim the League as my own conception. That honor—for such I hold it to be—belongs, it is true, to a civilian. I am sincerely sorry that your correspondent has been led—as I believe, misled—in part at least through an instance of publisher's tyranny, into doubts of the bonâ-fides of the advocates of the League. For myself—I say it as a strong opponent formerly of any kind of conscription, being, moreover, an old Volunteer—"The Briton's First Duty" bears the stamp of an advocacy as honest as it is able.

The author's own sub-title was substituted as soon as there was legal freedom to make the correction; the original sub-title having been, "A plea for a Pan-Britannic Militia." Is it not intelligible to an impartial mind that the desire was not to mislead but simply to avoid futile collision with unreasoning prejudice? "Conscription," as used in Napoleonic France, I take it, implied unequal compulsion with unlimited liability, allowing substitution; in contradistinction from National Military Service implying equality of compulsion, disallowing substitution, with liability limited to Home Defence.

Personally, I have as little sympathy with any cant pretence that National Service will not profoundly modify our national life as with the cant pretence that our present military system is truly voluntary merely because the compulsion is economic, not legal. Out of 100 regimental recruits recently questioned, ninety-five were, it is stated, unemployed or starving.

Colonel Haywood makes the curious assumption that practical support of a cause one has at heart is naturally disabling to its advocate. Will he not consent rather to give practical effect to his own philosophy that it is what a writer says that matters? More vital still, I venture to think, is the spirit of what he says. I admit freely that I sought to interpret and to answer rather the spirit than the letter of his remarks. That choice, mainly, I must again make lest I trespass unduly on your hospitality, though I would welcome opportunity for the closer, and necessarily narrower, discussion.

Believing that we are as a people face to face with momentous issues, a crisis in the national life and fate, one must surely desire most earnestly the consideration of this, and of any other, serious and sincere proposal on its merits, not primarily on its demerits—on the broad basis of the national need and the national judgment, not of mere personal and professional opinion, however distinguished. The nation, if the political sagacity of a ruling race still survives, will decide this question, and quickly. Her soldiers will decide it only if the decision is dementedly postponed until the hour of panic or of war. Many thoughtful men, I believe, have become converts to compulsory service only when, though not only because, they became convinced of the hopeless inadequacy of the voluntary system in existing conditions of world power.

The political instinct of the English people warned them long ago that the security of their State rested upon the maintenance of a balance of world power not unfavorable to themselves. On that balance to-day our very existence as an Empire depends. We have fought for it steadily from State-wise Tudor days, and we may need to fight for it again. We are all for peace and the status quo. It is very natural. Native virtue apart, the full-fed, well-propertied man is less disposed to covetousness than his sturdy but less opulent neighbor. But, if he is wise, he will remember that the friendliness of unaggressive strength is more convincing, and makes more surely for mutual respect and a stable peace than the most earnest protestations of civility ill-equipped.

Colonel Haywood quotes to us from a French writer a passage condemnatory of the effects, moral and physical, of military service, evidently intending that we should read this passage substituting England for France; since otherwise the quotation is irrelevant. But the effect of National Service will depend upon national habit and character. Has National Military Service then in Germany (of a far more prolonged and drastic character than we require) in Norway and in Denmark, to name only kindred States, so debauched their manhood? Colonel Haywood, it is surely true, has small faith in his countrymen.

As touching the question of physique and moral, it is worth noting that military service has been called in Germany the "Giant Doctor," and that at Krupp's works at Essen an extra two marks a week is paid to workmen who have passed through the national Army.

I would reply briefly to the letter of your correspondent "S.," and would suggest a question. If I read his philosophy aright, he holds that, save for the men whose trade is war (and those, doubtless, of their countrymen who still regard them as the necessary and honorable bulwark of their country's safety), moral force now rules the civilised world. I am, I hope, not insensible to such aspirations; yet I would live sincerely: remembering that the wheels of our life still run upon the earth, though we would fain "hitch our wagons to the stars."

Your correspondent, however, holds that already the limitless field of spiritual warfare and self-conquest is freely man's to possess. He wrote, I would not question it, in the belief that civilised humanity has sincerely attained to this higher plane of being. Will no doubts assail him if he should attend "Peace" meetings, as I have done, and see lurking sinister among the shadows the very presence of the spirit of strife? Nay, let him but read his own letter through again. Does he hold that such a man as General Gordon was in the "killing trade," or does he share his countrymen's belief that he was "soldier of Christ," as well as true servant of his Queen? Is it, in few words, the peace of God we want, or the peace of business and of the fear of death?

Your correspondent, Mr. C. E. Maurice, does me, I venture to believe, some injustice in suggesting that I desired in what I wrote to lay claim to higher motives than I allow to opponents. My desire was to discover mutually the attitude towards life and country that informs and inspires motive. That your correspondents have the highest welfare of humanity at heart I do not, nor would seem to, question. That they are of the faith of those who hold in high vision the mission of the British race, the working out of its generous ideals as the best and mightiest weapon yet forged in the long warfare of human fate, I have yet to be convinced. Who desires the end must, in a practical spirit, desire the means.

But where, then, is that Arcadia where the children flock to school from pure love of schooling: the happy land where compulsion is unknown! We do not shrink from teaching and enforcing obligations of individual, even of civic, duty from fear of ignoble results. Why, then, neglect the patriotic? Will a man be a worse citizen because he has learned to defend at need his hearth and home; his ideas of right; all that his country stands for in the world? Your correspondent in this vital matter of national self-defence does not believe in compulsion. Why? Is it not because he does not believe that here the end justifies the means; though that end be the existence of the British Empire?

Is it that the idealist's vision of a brotherhood of man knowing no boundaries of race, no limitations of racial self-seeking, lures some thinkers like a mirage? It will indeed prove a mirage if pursued in faithless haste: the far-off hope for the present opportunity.

History will refute the error on a darkened page if the British race goes under.

Experience warns us there are no short cuts to truth. Does not, then, a practical idealism suggest that the brotherly understanding of, and with, the men of our own race and blood must come first in the order of seeking and achievement?

Surely here is the heart of the conflict: an issue as stern and real as any whereon a people has been called to do battle with its spirit for the right.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES CECIL.

March 10th, 1909.

THE STRENGTH OF THE FLEET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of Saturday last you refer to an article contributed by me to this month's "Fortnightly Review," and you state that "while deprecating the demand for more ships for the fleet," I ask for more men. Would you permit me to correct both statements. I recognise that a large shipbuilding programme in the coming financial year is inevitable, and have said so repeatedly, while dissociating myself from certain alarmist statements which have been made in the past three or four years. Our supremacy to-day is unquestioned, and will remain so for many months, but we must build not for to-day, but for the immediate to-morrow. In battleships authorised since 1893 the position is as under, including ships laid down, or to be laid down, this year by the United States and Germany:—

Period.		England.	Germany.	America.	France.
1893-9	... ...	25	8	7	5
1900-4	... ...	13	12	14	6
1905-9	("Dreadnoughts")	14	13	8	6
		52	33	29	17

In the period 1893-9 we laid down six battleships, fulfilling Lord Brassey's ideas as to moderate displacement, the six "Canopus" class of 12,950 tons, and they are now obsolete, less powerful than the "Kaiser" class of the German Fleet. They are now being rapidly withdrawn from commission; after nine years their usefulness is exhausted, and we have forty-six effective battleships left, not because we did not build sufficient ships when facing the rivalry of France and Russia in the years of stress, but because we put our money in ships unworthy of the British Fleet. In modern ships we are falling behind, and, therefore, a large programme, unnecessary last year and the year before—when uncalled-for cries of alarm were raised—is now essential.

The purpose of my "Fortnightly Review" article was not to deprecate the building of additional ships, but to emphasise the necessity of making adequate provision for manning them, as Germany is doing. In the past ten years her naval personnel has been doubled. She has the economic advantage of conscription, which means cheapness of manning, whereas we have the economic disadvantage of voluntary service, with one overmastering advantage, a longer period of service, which should mean a higher standard of efficiency.—Yours, &c.,

ARCHIBALD S. HURD.

5, Downshire Hill, Hampstead, N.W.
March 9th, 1909.

[What about the moral disadvantage of conscription and the moral advantage of free service?—ED., NATION.]

THE POLICY OF THE NAVY LEAGUE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—After having misrepresented the utterances of the Navy League, you are pleased to gibe at the statement contained in my letter of March 2nd.

You cannot, therefore, in fairness, decline to publish this letter

Mr. McKenna, speaking at the Fishmongers' Hall, stated that the maintenance of the two-Power standard was a matter of arithmetic.

I venture to place that problem before your readers.

The Premier (Mr. Asquith) has affirmed his adherence to the two-Power standard, with a ten per cent. margin.

Ships of the pre-"Dreadnought" era rank amongst themselves. For confirmation on this point, consult the "Return of Battle Practice" (Cd. 4,514), recently issued, and see the position taken by the "Indomitable" in comparison with pre-"Dreadnought" ships.

We have, at the present time, including the "Lord

Nelson" and the "Agamemnon," fourteen "Dreadnoughts" built and building:—

Germany.		United States.
Building	9	Building	6
To be laid down this year ...	4	To be laid down this year ...	2
Total projected "Dreadnoughts"	13	Total projected "Dreadnoughts"	8

Simple addition gives us 13 + 8 = 21.

What is required, in addition to our fourteen built and building, to give us the two-Power standard in Dreadnoughts plus ten per cent.?

I scarcely think that the Navy League has, in any way, exaggerated the minimum requirement, for if you add 8 to 14 you arrive at a total of 22, which is not a ten per cent. margin over the two strongest Powers.—Yours, &c.,

Wm. Caius Crutchley,
Secretary.

The Navy League, London, S.W.
March 9th, 1909.

[It is not our fault that the annual official publication of the Navy League says one thing, both in its figures and its reasoned articles, and its executive another. As to its present policy, it is quite clear on the above statement that an addition of four "Dreadnoughts" gives us an ample preponderance over Germany in this class. This is all we want. For the rest we assure Captain Crutchley that two-Power standard or no two-Power standard, neither this Government nor any other is going to build against America and Germany combined.—Ed., Nation.]

THE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON COMMISSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is to be hoped that your readers will not be induced to take the view of "A Liberal Graduate" in considering this question. It is true that a resolution of the Senate asking for a Royal Commission to enquire into one thing has been met by a response from the Board of Education granting them something else. But if this means a victory for those professors on the Senate, who have been struggling for some years past to reduce the value of a London degree by reducing its difficulty, then it becomes necessary for every member of Convocation to consider how to alter the constitution of the Senate by strengthening the lay element.

The dualism of the University of London is the great distinction which it possesses. It is true that in a sense one of its functions is that of an Imperial Examining Board, but the examinees are people educated in various institutions which give an education equal to that which is obtained in the heterogeneous collection of colleges and institutions in and about London, whose students rank as "internal" students of the University. Even the much maligned correspondence system which, by the way, accounts for half, or nearly half, of the external graduations, is a means of giving industrious poor students an opportunity of academical distinction which would otherwise be denied them. However, the object of the present professorial agitation is not concerned with the "external" side, save in so far as it marks a jealousy of the success attained by "external" students when compared with that of the more favored "internal" group. The agitators now propose to remedy this disproportion by empowering the "internal" professors to exercise a dispensing power to grant degrees to their own students on their own recommendation. That is the short issue.

It is not true to say that examination in London University confers distinction on anyone who can steer through "examination papers constructed especially to suit no teaching in particular." The teachers, we are told, can, with "some assistance from outside examiners"—mark the professorial tone—give better testimony to the comparative merits of their student than examiners can. So, no doubt, the general manager of a bank could give better testimony of its financial position than the auditors, or the actuary of an insurance society better insight into the society's position than its directors. But human nature being what it is, we do not in commercial matters dispense with auditors or directors. Neither can we in education. Professors, like other people, are good and bad, energetic and idle, wise and foolish, capable of teaching and incapable. Since education in the modern sense began to shape itself in the early Middle Ages experience has proved independent examination to be the one and only means of auditing their work. It is not true to say that the clear-headed business men on the Senate, who demand the substantial continuance of the present system are unwilling to allow to teachers the influence exercised in every other University. What Oxford or Cambridge tutor or lecturer, for instance, can accompany an undergraduate to the schools, and declare him to be a fit and proper person to be admitted to a degree without any public test? Nor is this necessarily a conflict between the external and the internal sides, unless the fact that the external people have not asked for any relaxation of the public test may be construed as hostile. It would appear, however, that the internal side "now proposes to offer evidence to promote the complete independence of the two sides." That, of course, means the exclusion of the external sides from the corporation of the University. Truly this is a severe penalty on efficiency, and the danger to education is that, in English polemics, the inefficient generally prevails. Your correspondent hints that the Imperial College of Science and Technology hesitates to come in to the University, because of a reluctance on the part of its Professors to submit to these conditions of public test. No doubt this is because they dare not face such tests. They need not be ashamed of their inability. Whoever has to do, as I have, with secondary and elementary education in any part of this country views with despair the increasing power of the teacher, and the diminishing knowledge of the taught. The Board of Education, in substituting so-called inspection for examination, is responsible for this. But, if the evil of slackness is to spread upwards to the Universities, we shall be the laughing stock not only of people who do know here at home, but of all Europe. The trend of "A Liberal Graduate's" mind is well illustrated by his remarks on medical education. The London University, he complains, confines its degrees to candidates of honors standard. I am not a medical man, but a good many hundreds of guineas on their road to medical men pass through my hands yearly. If there be a London man in any town in which I require a medical opinion it is to the London man I apply, and I am thankful to say that most other persons in my business do the same. The reason is that, as simple members of the public, we know that men cannot get London medical degrees without medical knowledge. It is a most lamentable fact, which no distinguished member of the profession will deny, that year by year men are admitted to practice in this great profession who have neither aptitude nor knowledge. These are the men whom "A Liberal Graduate" wants to see holding London Degrees. Ex uno disce omnes.

The other problems referred to by "A Liberal Graduate" can be solved perfectly well by the Senate under present conditions. We hear of a Senate of fifty-six members drawn from "incongruous" sources. I challenge your correspondent to name one single member of that Senate who is unfit for his position.

The fact is that if the public do not control the teaching profession it will control the public. It has all the intellectual arrogance of the medieval clergy, without the superstitious backing of veiled mystery which made that arrogance so readily accepted. In our elementary schools the National Union of Teachers has destroyed all lay control. We meet as managers merely to register the teachers' decisions. In our secondary schools, the Boards of Governors, whether representing public authorities or private trustees, meet quarterly merely to sanction the payment of expenses. If it is suggested that the curriculum should be discussed, or the time-table considered, we are met with the most rigid non-possumus. The Senate of the University of London, which is fortunate in containing a few non-academical business men of University and commercial distinction, is the object of immediate attack. A few weeks ago it was the Congregation of the University of Oxford which was the target of the very same opposition. I say that it is vital that lay representation should be strong on the governing bodies of all these institutions, and I look with confidence to Mr. Haldane's Commission to put the Professors in their place.—Yours, &c., Interested.

March 11th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I make a correction in my communication of last week on this subject? Near the end of the second paragraph my word "most," written badly, no doubt, is printed "next." This alters my meaning in a very important way: it seems as if I were saying that the external examining side of the University is its principal function; whereas I want to state emphatically the view that this is secondary, and that the prime and principal purpose of the new Royal Commission should be to improve the organisation of University teaching and study, and in London itself. —Yours, &c., A LIBERAL GRADUATE.

March 11th, 1909.

ADULT SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Re Mrs. Gerald Paget's letter. Surely the word "reform" is a most misleading one, because it has become merely from use synonymous with improvement. Hence its use by so-called Tariff Reformers. Re-forming may be good or bad. I think every one who has studied the subject must see that whether we have adult suffrage or merely the limited Bill, the balance of electoral power will be in the hands of women. I have no fear of that, or objection to it, as long as care is taken to eliminate class privilege, which I believe those who favor the limited Bill, are fighting for.—Yours, &c.,

A. J. MARRIOTT,
Of the Adult Suffrage League.

249, Ludbroke Grove, Notting Hill,
March 13th, 1909.

OUR FOREIGN INVESTMENTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is instructive to notice the change of opinion of our Tariff Reform friends on this subject. Not many months ago, Mr. J. Ellis Barker, one of their leading controversialists, deplored the supposed falling-off of our foreign investments in comparison with those of Germany, which, he told us, were increasing by leaps and bounds. It is also not many years since concession-hunting in the Levant and Far East was considered a patriotic undertaking, and our representatives abroad were expected to assist in procuring fresh outlets for our capital, if necessary, to the detriment of the foreigner. Now all this is changed, and large foreign investments are considered a sign of economic and industrial decline! Under Tariff Reform we are expected to sell some of them to the foreigner; we are, instead, to convert grouse moors into cornfields, in addition to erecting a huge number of new factories. Other nations may then have to look after the development of our Colonies and foreign lands generally. This was hitherto, by common accord, considered of great advantage to the home industries, and it would be interesting to hear whether this opinion is no longer held.

It is reassuring that some of the more moderate Tariff Reformers, like your correspondent, Mr. H. W. Goldberg, do not deprecate all foreign investments; if he would carefully examine the list and tell us which he approves of and which not, I cannot help thinking that he would find the latter class to be a very unimportant portion of the total. His statement that a large outflow of capital would result if the credit of a country were to suffer a heavy blow is, of course, incontestable; but it does not follow that this is the only cause of such an outflow; as long as not only the British Government, but also many of our municipalities and railways can borrow on better terms than our rivals, this contingency does not exist in this country.—Yours, &c.,

G. ECKHARD.

Didsbury, Manchester,
March 9th, 1909.

THE INVERSION OF SENTENCES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As you have lately been discussing some questions in English literature in which learned grammarians have been engaged, I will ask them to be good enough to enlighten me as to the correctness of a comparatively novel method of describing events in newspapers, especially in police reports. The method is by inverting the sentence, beginning with the accusative or subject, and ending with the nominative or predicate as in the following example taken from a leading daily newspaper:—

"THE RAILWAY CARRIAGE OF NEWSPAPERS.

"Replying to a deputation of newspaper owners who waited on him yesterday to ask him to exert his influence with the object of securing from the railway companies a reduction of rates for the carriage of newspapers, Mr. Churchill, President of the Board of Trade, said," &c., &c.

The first five lines are taken up with the unknown subject, and three pronouns used to indicate the same unknown person. For my part I have to invert it again before I can clearly understand it. Perhaps the method was made, like many other things, in Germany. Will you be good enough to enlighten me whether the English language allows of this altered method, and, if so, where lie its advantages?—Yours, &c.,

M. D.

Hampstead,
March 8th, 1909.

WIND FLOWERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent observes in his interesting article that "The murmur of innumerable bees in immemorial elms" is not the "legitimate murmur of honey gatherers and pollen carriers."

May one also observe that neither is this extraordinarily disjointed combination of two most beautiful lines the legitimate murmur of Tennyson. However, your correspondent seems to have had some slight feeling of uneasiness, for he adds that the poet may be wrong, and no doubt he was thinking of the poet's powers both of observation and rhythm. When Tennyson wrote his well-known lines:—

"but every sound is sweet;
"Myriads of rivulets hurrying thro' the Lawn,
The moan of doves in immemorial elms,
And murmuring of innumerable bees," he was telling us of many pleasant sounds. I do not think that in this passage there is any ground for thinking that Tennyson connected the murmur of bees with elms. In all probability the lime tree was in his mind, for in another poem he writes of:—

"The lime a Summer-home of murmurous wings."

—Yours, &c.,

G. H. ISAACS.

Rosenheim, Branksome Park,
Bournemouth West,
March 8th, 1909.

CONSUMPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At the next meeting of the Marylebone Borough Council I shall propose that six beds be secured in Sanatoria for Consumption to which patients may be despatched immediately that tuberculosis is diagnosed, and where they may remain until they are cured.

The need is great and pressing. The ravages of consumption are widespread and terrible. In England there are about half-a-million of sufferers, and in each year some 50,000 of these are carried to the grave. What battlefield displays such horrors?

Science teaches us that tuberculosis is infectious, and, therefore, preventable. Science points out how the disease may be diagnosed at a very early stage, and science shows us how when action is immediately taken the patient may be placed in conditions which generally ensure his permanent cure.

At present the patient's health and life are frequently sacrificed, because when the disease has been diagnosed and a bed in a sanatorium is sought none is found to be available. All are occupied. "House Full" is up everywhere. Weeks and months usually elapse before the patient can secure a bed in a sanatorium.

This delay frequently means permanent disablement and even death. The damage to the lungs progresses. The affected tissues are destroyed, cavities are formed, and the sanatorium is reached too late.

This is a matter which affects us all. None of us can tell when he himself, or one of his dear ones, may have to look in vain for such a bed. I claim for my motion the support of every member of the public.—Yours, &c.,

J. Fletcher Little.

Park Crescent, Portland Place, W.
March 5th, 1909.

A DEFECT IN THE DEATH DUTIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—As the activities of the Liberal Government seem likely to be limited for some time to come to financial measures, I desire to point out a great defect in the system of Death Duties inaugurated by Sir William Harcourt in 1894. This defect is one which should be remedied by a Liberal Chancellor without delay, and would yield him a rich source of revenue without exposing him to a charge of partiality for the henroosts of his political opponents. Moreover, the effect of the change would be to promote that equality of sacrifice and that better distribution of wealth which all Liberals desire and not even the bitterest Tory dare denounce.

The Death Duties, as all know, are practically two. Estate Duty, levied on the corpus of the whole estate, real and personal, at death (which was Sir William Harcourt's extension of the old Probate Duty on personal property), and Succession Duty (in which term we may, for brevity, include Legacy Duty), levied on each separate legacy or gift. Now of these two duties Sir William Harcourt dealt with only one and by his wise graduation of the rate of duty from one per cent. or less on small estates to eight per cent. on estates of £1,000,000 and over, he turned into the national coffers a golden stream which has served the country well. Mr. Asquith followed in his steps with a further graduation of the same duty, and the present scale may be considered as for the time approximating to the Liberal standard of equality of burden.

Meanwhile the Succession Duty remains unreformed, for though the rates vary, they vary not according to the amount of the benefit received by the successor but according to the degree of relationship obtaining between him and his predecessor.

To show the inequality let us take the case of a millionaire who dying bequeathes a freehold cottage worth £300 to his coachman, and the rest of the million to his son. The coachman pays £60, for the cottage being real estate bears the following duties, viz., Estate Duty ten per cent., Succession Duty ten per cent., a total of twenty per cent. on a cottage worth £300.

The son, however, who receives the remainder of the million pays ten per cent. only, escaping Succession or Legacy Duty altogether.

A radical reform of the Succession Duty by making the rate of duty vary with the value of the succession, instead of with the degree of relationship, is urgently needed. The result would be to discourage the direct transmission of great aggregations of capital and to encourage their distribution and subdivision. By a wise graduation the yield of the duty might be increased as greatly as that of the Estate Duty has been, without placing any heavier burden than at present upon the recipients of small bequests.—Yours, &c.,

Sydney P. Turnbull.

Norbury, Scarborough.

VOTES FOR SOME WOMEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is interesting to note how many Suffragists shrink from the inevitable result of giving some women the Parliamentary vote. Mrs. Paget looks upon votes for some women as a valuable reform, but votes for all women would be a dangerous revolution. "History," she tells us, "gives many instances of the power of wise reform to scotch a nascent revolution." Doubtless many of the supporters of the Reform Bill of 1832 would have regarded the possible enfranchisement of agricultural laborers, to say nothing of lodgers, as a revolution, nevertheless it has followed in due course, as will women adult suffrage if votes are given to some women. Does Mrs. Paget seriously think that the bulk of married women, and factory and other workers, will quietly acquiesce in remaining what the Suffragists call "political outcasts, down-trodden slaves," &c., to all eternity, while their more fortunate propertied sisters are permitted to attain their so-called "rights"? The position of the Anti-Suffragists is clear enough. They are now constituted for the first time as an organised opposition to woman suffrage, because only within the last year has this question become one of possible practical politics.—Yours, &c.,

(Mrs.) F. Travers.

Tortington House, Arundel, Sussex,
March 8th, 1909.

"THE MARSHALS OF NAPOLEON."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I crave your courtesy to mention that the writer of your literary gossip makes a slight error in assuming that the book under the above title, which I have written for Messrs. Collier & Co., "covers the same ground" as another work on Napoleon's men-at-arms which he refers to. My book covers much more than "the same ground." Your contributor states that the other book on this subject treats of certain Marshals "selected from" the twenty-six created by the Emperor. I have devoted a separate chapter to each of the six-and-twenty heroes, these chapters having due relation, of course, to the proportion and value of the war-services rendered by the various recipients of the Imperial bâton.—Yours, &c.,

Percy Cross Standing.

National Liberal Club,
March 11th, 1909.

Poetry.

A LODGE IN THE WILDERNESS.

Out in the empty desert all alone,
Blown by the winds and lapped by waves of grass,
There stands beneath the unseeing skies a stone,
Where nevermore the foot of man shall pass.
Set up to mark the grave of one that died
Long years ago, whereon may be descried
In signs to all but human eyes unknown:
Faithful is God, for He remembereth;
The Lord is mighty, and forgetteth none.

Here come the deer, because the grass is sweet;
The wounded bird, because the shadow thrown
Shelters its aching body from the heat;
And here a thousand flying seeds are blown,
And after growth and blossom, here they die,
Even as he whose bones beneath them lie.
Of men to read the writing comes not one:
Faithful is God, for He remembereth;
The Lord is mighty, and forgetteth none.

The busy hands that did this carving make,
The eyes that wept, the voices that made moan
Long respite from their grief and labors take;
Their tears are dry, their lamentation done.
The stars, like jewels on a banner spread,
Are borne to other battles overhead;
Still cries the grave, taunting oblivion:
Faithful is God, for He remembereth;
The Lord is mighty, and forgetteth none.

Lucy Lyttelton.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THERE is some possibility that the Clarendon tercentenary may not pass without adequate memorial. The Rev. John Willcock, who is already known by his "Life and Times of the Marquis of Argyle," and a biography of Sir Thomas Urquhart, the Tudor translator of Rabelais, is engaged upon a new "Life of Clarendon," which may be ready for publication in the autumn. It is also to be hoped that the Oxford University authorities will act upon a suggestion made by Professor Firth in his recent lecture. If the University, he says, desires fitly to commemorate the tercentenary of Clarendon's birth, it should complete the publication of his papers, and print a new edition of his life. "The last edition of the Life and of the Continuation of the Life was published in 1857. Except as a piece of printing, it is utterly unworthy of the University Press. The index is one of the worst in existence. There are no notes. The dates given in the headlines are frequently wrong. As for the text, the reader is given no notice of the fact that large passages of the original have been transferred to the pages of the History of the Rebellion, and some passages of the original have not been printed either in the History or the Life. In every respect the edition is a glaring contrast to Dr. Macray's edition of the companion work."

* * *

A NEW book by Professor James, of Harvard, is announced for publication next month by Messrs. Longmans. Its title is "A Pluralistic Universe," and the volume will contain the Hibbert lectures given by Professor James at Oxford last year. The main position advanced in the book is that religion has everything to gain from being associated with empiricism and pluralism. For Professor James the pluralistic philosophy is the only ground upon which "experience" and "reason" may come to a compromise, and his lectures aim at convincing idealists that this is possible. Part of the coming work is given up to a discussion of Bergson's theories. There are many signs that Bergson is gaining the ear of our philosophical teachers. We announced some weeks ago that Father Tyrrell is at work upon a study of Bergson, which will be published by Messrs. Constable.

* * *

To the bookish man there could hardly be a more fascinating subject than that chosen by Mr. Lawrence Lewis, an American author, for a volume which will be called "The Advertisements of 'The Spectator.'" The advertisements taken in by Samuel Buckley at the Dolphin in Little Britain, or by Charles Lillie, the perfumer, at the corner of Beaufort Buildings, Strand, or (towards the end) by Jacob Tonson, provide excellent material for gossipy and discursive writing upon the literary and social life of Queen Anne's time. What a delightful book Mr. Austin Dobson would have given us had he taken up the theme!

* * *

MR. WILLIAM DE MORGAN is still engaged upon the manuscript of his new novel, which has been announced as "Blind Jim," though Mr. De Morgan is dissatisfied with that title, and will probably change it to "It Never Can Happen Again." The book will be longer than either of Mr. De Morgan's former novels—both of which ran to much greater length than the average novel of to-day—and it will be published in two volumes. "The New York Times" states that a competent critic who has seen the manuscript pronounces it to be the best which Mr. De Morgan has written.

* * *

WE learn that a biography of Dr. John Kells Ingram is to be written by Mr. T. W. Lyster, the Librarian of the National Library of Dublin. Mr. Lyster's friendship with Dr. Ingram, and his fine discernment in literary matters promise a very desirable book. Doctor Ingram's versatility and depth were astonishing. In his youth he won fame by the stirring song, "Who Fears to Speak of 'Ninety-Eight?" and the achievements of his life were solid and enduring. Equally learned in the classics and in mathematics, an ardent student of science, of philology, of anthropology, an authority on political economics, and a follower and exponent of the philosophy of Positivism, it was with good reason that one of his colleagues at Trinity College called him "probably the best educated man in the world." He was a man greatly beloved by his friends.

* * *

PRINCE KROPOTKIN'S book on the French Revolution, which had a place among Messrs. Heinemann's announcements at the end of 1908, will probably appear during the spring. It will be published in French and in English, in Paris, London, and New York. Prince Kropotkin writes French and English with equal ease, and the present work has been written in French and then turned into English. The volume will be of very considerable bulk, containing as it does some sixty odd chapters. Prince Kropotkin has approached the subject from a somewhat novel point of view. He considers the Revolution as containing two movements: first, that of the middle classes against the Court; secondly, the revolt of the peasant against the grinding oppression of the feudal system still in operation. He devotes his research to showing how it was really the peasants who forced the Revolution. The middle-classes looked for reform, but the peasant demanded abolition of his disabilities, and Prince Kropotkin traces the whole history of the troubled years, recounting how the middle-classes actually struggled to suppress the peasants and almost joined with the Court against them to preserve the old régime, until the enormous forces working among the people proved too strong for any repression, and brought about the full Revolution.

* * *

MR. WILLIAM TOYNBEE, whose "Vignettes of the Regency," published a year ago, showed a real knowledge of the period and command of a pleasant style, is bringing out through Messrs. Constable another volume dealing with the same period. "Glimpses of the 'Twenties" gives the material from which the vignettes were outlined. The book is described as "the Court Circular to the first two volumes of Spencer Walpole's 'History,' and the ante-chamber to Greville and Mountstuart Grant Duff." This sounds promising, and with the present craze for anecdotal memoirs, Mr. Toynbee's book is likely to be very successful.

* * *

A COLLECTION of letters by Gambetta, which are said to throw a flood of new light upon his character and public actions, is to be published immediately by MM. Ollendorff of Paris. There are also several intimate glimpses of his family life, contributed by M. P. B. Gheusi, who edits the volume.

* * *

A STUDY of "The Life and Times of John Hüs," by Count Lützow, is announced by Messrs. Dent. Count Lützow, who is an authority upon Bohemian history and literature, lays special stress upon the part played by Hüs as a Bohemian patriot, and leader of the national movement. Unlike most previous biographers of Hüs, Count Lützow is inclined to hold that the Bohemian reformer was less indebted to the ideas of Wycliffe than to the theologians of the University of Prague, his immediate fore-runners.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Dawn of the Catholic Revival in England, 1781-1803." By Bernard Ward. (Longmans, 2 vols, 25s. net.)

"Hints on House Furnishing." By W. Shaw Sparrow. (Nash, 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Third French Republic." By Frederick Lawton. (Grant Richards, 12s. 6d. net.)

"Military Needs and Military Policy." By the Right Hon. H. O. Arnold-Forster, M.P. (Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Trials of Five Queens." By R. Storry Deans. (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.)

"Galicia, the Switzerland of Spain." By Annette M. B. Meakin. (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Monuments of Christian Rome." By Arthur L. Frothingham. (Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net.)

"Faith." By R. B. Cunninghame Graham. (Duckworth, 6s.)

"The Immortals' Great Quest." By J. W. Barlow. (Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d. net.)

"Au Pays d'Exil de Chateaubriand." Par Anatole Le Braz. (Paris: Champion, 3fr. 50.)

"Traditionalisme et Démocratie." Par D. Parodi. (Paris: Colin, 3fr. 50.)

"La Pensée de Ruskin." Par André Chevrillon. (Paris: Hachette, 3fr. 50.)

"Figures de Moines." Par Ernest Dimnet. (Paris: Perrin, 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE REVOLUTION AS A ROYALIST SAW IT.

Ordinary men are often better witnesses of the extraordinary than men of genius, and the most illuminating records of such an upheaval as the French Revolution have come from writers who but for this convulsion would to-day be altogether forgotten. The "Recollections of Baron de Frénilly" offer a notable addition to this most fascinating literature. Born twenty-one years before the meeting of the States General, of the rich financial classes, he saw from the inside, first the world which seemed as if it never could be moved, then the world which utterly destroyed it. A royalist of royalists, he experienced all the vicissitudes of fortune which reversed so completely the accepted standards. Now he is a young Parisian millionaire. Now he is hiding in the provinces, a suspected fugitive, or wandering in poverty, an exile. He was serving at the Tuilleries on the 10th of August in the one royalist company of the National Guard. He saw the tumbril carrying Danton to his death. He watched, with little sympathy, France sweeping out beyond its frontiers and conquering all the world; and watched, again, the world in arms against her, marching into the hitherto inviolate capital. He desired in the restoration the extirpation of the revolutionary idea, the re-establishment of the old régime in all its impossibilities. And he denounced the returned Bourbons because they had the sense to see, in all their follies, that there were some limits which could not be overpassed. He occupied some small place in literature and in politics during those days of order. When France awoke again in 1830 he shook the dust of it from off his feet, and departed into self-chosen exile. He died there in 1848—in another year of awakening—having seen during his eighty years one of the most amazing historical panoramas which the world has ever known.

The rulers of old France—at the end—were neither abnormally criminal, abnormally selfish, nor abnormally stupid. They were simply stricken with blindness: knowing no longer the signs of the time. Frénilly, in this attractive, and, in many respects, brilliant, memoir, reveals himself as a man of intelligence, of kindness, and of compassion. His only deficiency is that he is never even beginning to understand what is coming into his universe. The revolution appears to him but as a squalid uprising of criminals and outcasts, led by a band of greedy and unscrupulous adventurers. A whiff of grapeshot, and little determination on the part of Louis, could have choked it in its birth. One of his earliest recollections is of Voltaire's triumphant visit to Paris, and of himself—then a child of ten—being sent by his mother, alone, in an "apple-green satin coat, lined with pink, green satin breeches, white silk stockings, and buckled shoes, completing my toilet with sword, hat, and a triple row of curls," with a letter of admiration to the old man. "The adventure created a sensation. People spoke of nothing else. Two days later the 'Journal de Paris,' which," he maliciously adds, "was almost as truthful then as it is now, said that a charming child had escaped from its parents' house in order to pay homage to Voltaire." Later came the introduction to Paris society: centering in the Palais Royale, love-making and merry-making, unconscious of the shadow of impending destruction. "People dined at two and supped at ten. They supped after the theatre, which began between five and six, and finished between eight and nine. After supper they played cards. . . Pleasure was people's only occupation." "Balls had become a sort of social obligation." "Everything there was gay and enchanting: the illumination and decoration of the rooms: the women's dresses, beflowered and befeathered: the costumes of the men, all silk and embroidery: the richly furnished buffets: and the choiceness of the suppers, which were repeated three or four times during the night." Behind, in the darkness outside, was the other nation, watching, envious, and indignant at this superfluity of enjoyment, destined so soon to make a terrible end of it all. But at the centre—in the early developments which settled all the subsequent catalcysms, every one was far too good-tempered and indolent to resist. "They allowed things to slide, either laughingly or with a shrug of the shoulders." "Thus was everything toppling over. There was nothing but a succession of false steps and falls. Comptrollers General fell one after the other."

The author passes to the Provinces, to the pleasant country society which gathered round Poitiers. And here also is the old life, scarcely disturbed by fear of the future, entertaining, enjoying, conversing, love-making: thinking that human life can endure upon such a basis:—

> "I arrived in Poitiers at the beginning of 1788," is the confession, "and therefore passed the terrible winter of 1789 there, but of which I recollect only balls and fêtes. In the spring came the elections, and of these also I remember only the dinners and their president, the Duc de Luxembourg. After the elections came the States-General, and then the taking of the Bastille, which cost me a louis, for there seemed to me to be as much likelihood of the moon being captured as that fortress. I began by denying the possibility of the thing, then backed up my opinion by a wager, and in losing learnt at an early period not to be astonished at any stupidity on the part of the Government."

So they ate and drank and rose and slept, until the flood came and destroyed them all.

Paris—that "biting, mischief-making, and ballad-making city, the enemy of its masters"—exhibited a society still playing with the revolutionary ideas, long after the provincial nobility had utterly condemned them. "My adorable mother," says Frénilly, "felt for the dawn of the revolution that indulgence which she had for everything and everybody." "It is a child," she said, "that is committing many follies. But it will grow up to be a man." "Mother," I replied, "it will grow into a monster." Two years after the meeting of the States General everything seemed stable and prosperous. In the spring of 1791 "everything was apparently peaceful: universal destruction was being carried out legally. The public debt had been absorbed by assignats. Commercial prosperity was at its height, and the mass of citizens said, 'All's well! The revolution is over: let us enjoy ourselves and rest.'" The general gaiety was interrupted by the abortive flight to Varennes—the real death blow to the French monarchy; and by the emigration. Yet even in January, 1792, in Paris, "for a long time past the winter had never been so brilliant. One might have thought that the people were accumulating joy to last them all the time they were about to sorrow. There was something prophetic in this surfeit of pleasures." Foreign intervention, the declaration of war upon the revolution, with the invasion of France and sudden danger turned the vision from light to darkness. One of the best of all historical pictures is here given of the night of the tenth of August: its confusion, its random orders, the uncertainty both of the King and of the mob. Louis reviewing his soldiers "silent and careworn as he slouched along, and seeming to say, 'All is lost.'"

From that day to the overthrow of Thermidor, madness and frenzy had seized the people. The mildest of them became possessed with a fury not their own. "There was a certain young and honest engraver who every month used to bring me parts of new works from the gallery of the Palais Royal—a man with the candour and timidity of a girl. I saw him a few days after August 10th, and found him beaming with joy. 'What is the matter?' I asked. 'Ah! sir,' he replied, 'Providence has smiled upon me: I have killed three Swiss.'" Fleeing from the stricken capital, Frénilly finds as companion in the diligence, "a stout, short, rotund little gentleman, a native of Lorraine." They meet the Orléans prisoners being brought in for trial. "They had but one more day to live. Whilst this sight was making my hair stand on end, my companion began to shout at the top of his voice, 'A la guillotine.' 'Wretched man,' said I, pulling him by the coat; 'at any rate keep your tongue still.' 'Ah!' he replied, 'I shout because I am frightened.'" "There," says Frénilly, drily, "you have the history of the whole of France."

Even these tragedies were not without their humor. In Frénilly's estate in the Nivernais, the Curé of the parish, an ex-Grenadier of the French Guards, and "the biggest scamp you ever set eyes on," had got himself appointed mayor. On the command that all signs of feudality should be destroyed, he proceeded to smash to pieces the four towers of the castle. "After this, he sent me in a bill for the work of demolition." They celebrate in a tiny country town in the neighborhood the Feast of Reason, Frénilly, as "good citizen," participating. "Only men were present. All the journeymen cutlers, anchor-makers, and other artisans of Cosne stood upright—and I with them—in front of planks which served as tables, without tablecloths, napkins, spoons, knives, or forks. Everything was eaten with the fingers. My neighbor imprudently drew a clasp knife from his pocket, whereupon there was a general cry of protest." Pitchers of wine were passed from mouth to mouth "with such frequency that half the guests were under the tables at the end of an hour." The day ends in indescribable orgies. "Such was the welcome I received," says Frénilly, "at the capital of my barony."

* "Recollections of Baron de Frénilly." Edited, with an introduction, by Arthur Chuquet. Heinemann. 10s. net.

He sees the terrible process to its end, half-stunned by the enormity of the catastrophe. One day in the Rue Saint Honoré, he sees Danton and his companions passing to their death "in three carts painted red, harnessed to his horses, and escorted by five or six gendarmes making their way through an immense and silent crowd which showed no joy and did not dare to express its horror." Of Danton, "his enormous round head was proudly turned towards the stupid multitude, with impudence on his forehead and an expression of rage and indignation on his lips." Paris lies silent under the terror; on every wall, "Liberté, Fraternité, Egalité, ou la Mort"; men speaking in whispers, women remaining indoors. Afterwards the richest men in France are waiting in the queues for the morsels of black viscid bread which alone the Government permitted. "Many a time when this pseudo-bread was brought to me have I thrown it against the wall where it remained sticking, and not even my dog would approach it."

When society at last recovered, and Bonaparte restored civil order, "it was the height of good manners," says Frénilly, "to be ruined, to have been suspected, persecuted, and, above all, imprisoned. Without the last qualification, there was neither salvation nor consideration for you in society. People greatly regretted that they had not been guillotined."

It is the testimony of an eye witness to great happenings—full of prejudice yet full of vivacity, brilliant characterisation, extraordinarily alive.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF VITALISM.*

The philosopher and the theologian really ask the same question—What God shall we worship? It is true that the question is addressed by each to different informants. The latter interrogates the data supplied by feeling, ethical or otherwise; the former hopes that the conditions of human thinking will be able to throw some light on the subject. We all know what a dubious and varying oracle feeling has proved to be throughout the ages during which man has been a suppliant at its shrine. So many of its answers are not merely dark but nonsensical. We can see some glimmerings of meaning in the notion that fire, or an animal, or man himself, is divine. But to assert that a stick or stone or an object of human manufacture is God, seems more abject than puerility. Nevertheless the philosopher with all his caution seems to have elicited answers fully as various and, some of them, equally absurd. The philosopher does not practise methods of supplication. Rather he may be compared to the hunter who with a full apparatus of weapons and snares, seeks to waylay or entrap the object of his chase. He equips himself with technicalities. He will not, for example, ask in plain terms, what is God, but what is Reality. Yet a recent reply to the philosophic quest has been (put bluntly) that God is a machine; or, if we wish to state the doctrine in the technical form in which its producers would recognise it, that the real world is an assemblage of inanimate forces.

Some people would hold that only in refinement of expression is this to be preferred to the crude notions of fetichism. And thus it is that the present day witnesses a revolt against the mechanical philosophy which reached the fullest expansion of its power in the writings of Huxley and Haeckel. Abroad, the Germans are reviving a doctrine of the Will, but it is in France that the theories of vitalism have found their most brilliant exponent. The appearance of M. Bergson promises to be a turning-point in the history of European thought. Here we have a thinker who has at his disposal that most exquisite of instruments—modern French prose, and who handles it in a fashion to command the admiration of his compatriots. With the spirit of a consummate artist he refuses to make his philosophy a mere file of memoranda. His writing has the unity and flow, above all the imagination, of a poem. Again, he is not the mere metaphysician, pulling the threads out of the fabrics which the physical sciences have woven, and demonstrating their rottenness and perishable nature, while himself incapable of taking part in the production of scientific theory. No biologist who reads M. Bergson's pages, proving, as they do, a first-hand knowledge of all the most recent work in the scientific sphere, will doubt M. Bergson's competence, or set him down as merely an intelligent amateur. Finally, the metaphysician has as little right to regard him as a biologist who has strayed into the fields, or lost himself in the forests, of philosophy. The student of ancient speculation will find that M. Bergson is well versed in its whole history from Plato to Plotinus. The logician will discover that our author has confidence enough in his theories to set up his own doctrine in express opposition to the whole of the methods of bygone philosophising, from the time of Aristotle to that of Kant.

M. Bergson's quarrel with the whole of preceding philosophy is due to a profound disbelief in the axiom which all previous theory seems to have assumed about the nature of reality. The real world in the eyes of materialists and idealists alike is something static. This is due to the fact that our thought is most at home when dealing with solids and their relations in space. Geometry is the great triumph of our thinking. When we wish to picture to ourselves motion, we represent it as a direction marked by a line in space. Every science, even one which describes the behavior of moving bodies like the stars and planets, consists of a set of statements each of which is true at the same time; all co-exist in the eternal unchanging present of truth. Ambitious mechanical theories of the universe regard past and future as two sides of an equation linked together by a rigid band—the mathematical sign of equality; the moving, flowing time which creates the one out of the other, and which we all experience, is left out of account. The universe, therefore, is conceived to be something of which all the parts are given once for all. The state of the world at any moment is simply a redistribution of its original elements. If we are idealists and wish to account for the perishable nature of the world of sense, we take it to be merely a distortion of the imperishable reality which exists apart from it. Whether all is matter or all is mind it is a mind that never alters and a matter which is indestructible. But, maintains our critic, it is time which is the real fact; it continually unfolds to us that which is new. So far from the future being already contained in the past, it is perfectly impossible to predict the exact nature of what will occur from any knowledge, however complete, of past conditions. The world is continually creating itself in time; it is not a musical box that, once set going, must play just one set of tunes and no other. As a matter of fact, our habit of thinking of the world as a set of parts with fixed relations to each other is begotten by the necessities of our practical life. We wish to fasten on certain events in the continuous series of causes and effects, as we lay hold on the handle of a knife or a hammer. We wish to use the world as our tool, and we imagine that because certain facts can be so employed, the whole is fashioned according to their pattern. Science then, suffers from an incurable illusion as to the nature of the universe and will not help us to discover its secret.

To what then must we trust if science proves useless? Are we doomed to scepticism? Some people may have difficulty in making out the significance of M. Bergson's reply. The secret of life is discovered rather by living than by thinking, and this life which brings us face to face with the absolute is not wholly unillumined. We still have intuition left us. It is true that this intuition is intermittent; in developing our intelligence for the purpose of combating the brute forces of nature we have, to a large extent, lost hold of intuition, which is an alternative and distinct mode of consciousness. Intuition is a nearly extinguished lamp, which yet, from time to time, leaps into flame when a vital interest is concerned. "Sur notre personnalité, sur notre liberté . . . . sur notre origine et peut-être aussi sur notre destinée, elle projette une lumière vacillante et faible, mais qui n'en perce pas moins l'obscurité de la nuit où nous laisse l'intelligence."

* "L'Evolution Créatrice." Par Henri Bergson. 4ième édition. Paris: Alcan.

To the reader who is not an expert in philosophy, probably the most interesting part of the book will be the first chapter, in which M. Bergson sifts the wheat from the chaff in the current theories of evolution. He holds, as we have seen, that time is creative, that absolutely fresh developments are manifested from time to time in the history of the world. Not only so, but the development of fresh forms is not accidental. Neither is it purposive. Yet history is the gradual unfolding of an "élan vital" which strives to follow definite routes. Darwin fails wholly to account for the parallel formation of an organ of vision in the vertebrates and in the mollusca. The logic of this passage is fine. Insensible variations in the various parts of this intricate structure could not await each other's appearance unless they are not accidental. Again abrupt variations (such as those which De Vries seems to have proved to be possible) could not concur in all parts of the organ and lead to improved vision, and at the same time be accidental. Similarly the theory that environment produces variation, and the doctrine that acquired characteristics are transmissible, are admirably analysed (we know of nothing so masterly in the writings of the English biologists), and their inability to explain the phenomena is demonstrated. We are left with no solution but that of the vital striving which, throughout the realm of organised beings, struggles upwards in a movement which is the inverse of that which has resulted in the lifeless inorganic world.

A POETIC COMEDY.*

"Sisyphus" will come as a surprise to most readers of Mr. Robert Trevelyan's other poetical works. The world has probably regarded him hitherto as an industrious and single-minded poet, with very genuine poetical gifts not supported by much direct personal force or distinctive quality. Certainly it is hard to remember in Mr. Trevelyan's previous books anything that gave promise of the originality and weird humor which we feel in "Sisyphus." It really is something new.

It is an "operatic fable" in three Acts, representing the story of Sisyphus, the Cunning King of Corinth. In Act 1 Sisyphus dies, is cast out unburied, and returns from Hades to interrupt the nuptials of his widow with her lover—a prince bearing the somewhat exclamatory name of Eudamidas, son of Eublastidas. In Act 2, according to the myth, he overcomes with wine the ancient gods Death and Sleep, and fastens Death up in a chest which can never be opened. In Act 3 he proceeds from this vantage ground to make a bargain with the gods; gets near victory over them; then is tricked and ruinously defeated.

Now we have had many comic operas and burlesques upon Greek mythology before this, and rather vulgar and dull things they are, most of them. But "Sisyphus" is the work of a real poet, and a real lover of the strange bye-paths of Greek myth. Grotesquely as all the mythical material is treated, it is never cheapened or vulgarised. One hardly ever feels the author "trying to be funny." It is as if he was steeped in these old queer myths, and saw them instinctively in a way of his own which increased their queerness while preserving their beauty. One is reminded of the distorted forms that can be seen in driving clouds, or in the fire.

As the treatment is never vulgar, so it is very seldom consciously or deliberately witty. The cloud shapes sometimes accidentally drift into a shape that makes you laugh. That is all. And the verse is as far as possible from the slick, clean-cut verse that one associates with burlesque. It is dreamy and shapeless verse, utterly irregular, yet written with a great sense of metre, and often achieving real beauty. Take, for instance, the prayer of the chorus outside the King's sick chamber:—

> "Thanatos, O just Thanatos!
> Oh delay not; hither haste thee,
> That this Sisyphus, the tyrannous, the abominable,
> Thou may'st carry to Acheron away with thee!
> Haste, oh haste thee hither, Death!
> Stone dead, the proverb saith,
> Hath no fellow: then haste thee, Death."

Presently Sisyphus is carried out to say farewell to his trusty and well-beloved people:—

> "Hush! Beware! Beware!
> But now his thin lips stirred,
> Have a care!
> He liveth still.
> Speak no rash word,
> Lest ye be overheard,
> And your expectations crossed,
> When he alters a tenth time to your cost,
> With a last bitter codicil
> His nine-times altered will.
>
> SISYPHUS.
>
> My wife, my sons, draw near my bed, for I
> Once more would speak with you before I die.
> Where is my lawyer? Let him fetch my will.
> I wish to add another codicil."

There is the same dreamlike quality in the working out of the plot. Comic situations tremble on the verge of horror, as in a dream, yet always a dreamy, not a realistic, horror. For instance, Sisyphus's wife. By that tenth codicil he has compelled her to throw his body out unburied. When he gets to Hades he complains of this treatment, and gets leave to return to earth simply for the purpose of punishing so wicked a wife. He is to live until he has punished her. The wife is at first in terror of the punishment; then sees that she is perfectly safe, as Sisyphus has no wish to cease living; then she longs to be punished, and is ready to endure anything, if only her bland and mocking husband will die again. Rather a similar effect is produced by the drifting variations of feeling in the chorus, and again by the mixed joy and despondency of the world when Death is imprisoned in the box.

There is a good deal of Aristophanes in the poem; there is also a good deal of rhymeless quantitative verse in the style of Robert Bridges. However, if quantitative verse of this sort is ever in place, it is in a theme like "Sisyphus." The whole book, both as drama and as poetry, seems to us to show talent of a quite peculiar and noteworthy sort.

THE ARTISTIC POSE.*

It is curious that the more people talk of art and nature the further off are they from the real thing. Bohemianism is now connoted with people who write fourth-rate novels in comfortable Chelsea flats. The men who struggled along, on hack wages, in eighteenth century Grub Street, from Savage to Chatterton, were innocent of "the artistic temperament," and they left the luxury of the artistic pose to their patrons, the "Cognoscenti." The noble amateur, indeed, has always been in evidence in the field of the arts, often beating the professionals on their own lines. But not till the vast hordes of our great public, definitely in search of culture, swarmed into the enclosures of literature and the arts did the horrors of the æsthetic pose come to light. Ruskin, by throwing down the barriers between the middle-class soul and the arts, is responsible, perhaps, for the reaction of "exclusiveness" by which Oscar Wilde and his little group of "decadents" took advantage of our public's innocence. No sham is, indeed, too gross in matters artistic to take in a public naturally wanting in æsthetic sensibility, whose mental life is a battlefield between ethical conceptions and sensuous temptations. The term "Art," indeed, in England is so vulgarly tainted with the idea of moral laxity or indulgence in sensuous pleasure that practically everything that is uttered about "the function of art"—even at a Royal Academy banquet!—is warped by an uneasy consciousness of falsity. The relations of the artist to the public are false to-day because art itself has been so long a luxury for the few, and a superfluity for the many.

"Syrinx," not wholly worthless in itself, is a good example of how a bad work of art, false and confused in

* "Sisyphus, an Operatic Fable." By R. C. Trevelyan. Longmans.

* "Syrinx." By Laurence North. Heinemann. 6s.

outlook, helps to bring art into contempt. All the characters, who are supposed to be cultured, fastidious, well-bred folk, are constantly talking about art, thinking about art, being inspired by the masterpieces of art, antique, medieval, and modern, and yet their character, their inner dignity, their social value, all are considerably below the level, say, of intelligent gas-stokers or tramway conductors. Luxurious parasites of an overfed and blasé London society, Aspasia, the heroine of "Syrinx," and her set of sculptors, painters, musicians, are able to represent "the artistic temperament," merely because the insensibility and stupidity of our general public's attitude makes art to-day an affair of hot-house culture and not a daily, living force.

The proverb about breaking a butterfly on the wheel would be applicable in the case of the novel before us, if Laurence North (a pseudonym suspiciously feminine?) did not, half consciously, present us with a diagnosis of those morbid symptoms of the "æsthetic pose" which break out like an eruption on the skin of cultured society. The bewitching heroine, Aspasia, with her "form very supple and so flowing in its lines as to disguise its real voluptuousness, a face of perverse attractiveness, mystical, sleepy grey eyes that seemed all comprehending," personifies, indeed, all the sensuous temptations which the honest British imagination shudders at and is drawn to, turn by turn, when "Art" is in question. In a sense the novel is amateurish and childish, but in another sense it has meaning significance as showing how neurotic the "artistic temperament" grows when it is cut off from healthy contact with the actual necessities of life. The author has shrewd glimpses of the painful fact, and in a few passages she shows us that she has touched the truth about the pseudo-Bohemian "artistic" London coteries which "Syrinx" glorifies:—

> "Do you not know that curious other consciousness that London seems to awaken? In London we are never the same creatures we are elsewhere. It makes us something we can't define or realise, something we can hardly remember when we leave, something we inevitably become the moment we return to it. Men talk of the wickedness of cities. In other towns it may be a moral influence; in London, I am sure, it has a physical basis. There the purely spiritual vision seems smeared, impossible. I feel irritable, exacting, discontented, carping, full of a mad craving for excitement, no matter what. But in the country everything is changed. The simplest things content me, the glare and fascination of the city don't seem contemptible; they simply cease to exist. I'm another, perhaps a happier, being. The books of town, the so-called new thought, make no appeal. I become what my London self would laugh at as old-fashioned, if the two selves ever met; but they don't."
>
> * * *
>
> He and Aspasia weren't boring each other in the least. She was tremendously interested.
>
> "She always is for the first hour or two."
>
> "Not with men who don't count in some way. Believe me, Marie, this person does count somehow. . . . You know, there's a breadth and soundness (don't laugh) about those real scholars that our little cliquey devotions and prejudices can't give us. We laugh at Matthew Arnold, and all he stands for; we roll our eyes and make our prettiest mouths, and say: 'Dreadful person' when he's mentioned. It puts the timid or shallow people down at once, and we have it all our own way; but Aspasia's Motorman would just smile, and pass by, secure on his own serene heights. We acknowledge one or two prophets, and they are our gods. These men see all that's good in the prophet's work; they also know exactly what's wrong with it. We don't, and that's what's wrong with us. We know lots of little masters, as we know people in society. Motorman, I am sure, knows the few great masters like old friends, and understands exactly where the little masters come in."

These passages, taken from the chapter "A Voice from Gath," have reason in them, but unfortunately most of the rest are vitiated by severe symptoms of the disease that Whitman once styled "the beauty disease." When we encounter Aspasia en route for Pangbury station, her step "lagging luxuriously," "under the mantle of twilight pierced only by the low-hung light of Venus," and when "stretching out her arms, her hands lightly curved upwards in invocation" to "Aphrodite, Queen of Heaven," the first stanza of Sappho's ode (in the original) thrills on her lips, "we are prepared for the entry of the jeune premier, who arrives in the person of Robert Akenside, aged forty, ex-fellow of Amiel College, with the Hertford, the Ireland, and every other academic distinction to his name." In return for a lift in his motor the entrancing Aspasia, "who reigns by divine right of intellect and a fastidious capacity for enjoyment," invites Akenside to a dinner at the Carlovingian, where he meets the "cleverest set in London," the Polite Outcasts. The talk of all these people is hollow, affected, and pretentious. Akenside, who is not only a finished scholar but "one of the first authorities on sculpture," of course, falls hopelessly in love with the "incomparable" siren who "brow-beats him with the most delicate arts," and who "is alive, so brilliantly alive that she could be intense in every phase." His rival is Laleham, an ineffable painter who invites Aspasia to accompany him to Italy "to some quiet little town by the sea, far away from the vulgar tread of the tourist," and share with him the simple life. "What the hour may bring I shall accept gladly, content if I can realise myself fully, completely, passing from sensation to sensation as naturally and unconsciously as my breath comes and goes." Aspasia at first declines, but, in twenty-four hours, feeling tired by her literary labors for the savant, Hardiman, at the British Museum, and being worried by her dressmaker's bill, and the discovery that "the sordid dreariness of having few clothes, clothes that for all their artistry, cried aloud to other women that they cost little, had become insupportable," she reflects that it is "hereditary prejudice" to think "that love must be the only justification of supreme surrender." She wires to Laleham, "I am no longer a conventional person," but alas! that unforeseeing person has judiciously departed for Florence. And Aspasia is forced to subside on another genius, Seward, "the sculptor of the future," whose call she obeys "with the rapture of a devotee." "To her genius was sacrosanct, a thing to be worshipped with divine honors—if he had genius Aspasia set him above all law. Called to be his ministering priestess she must set everything aside for his service. . . . Her devotion to art was a passion almost maternal. She was to be partner in the birth of a glorious work, and the thought yielded her the ecstacy of motherhood." All this simply means that after the first meeting between the two, when she shows Seward that her knowledge of the literature of love was "as surprising as it was shameless," "fencing lightly with Procopius, Apuleius, Philostratus, Brantôme, Casanova, Mendès, Mirbeau, Pierre Louys, and the Arab Sheikh Netzauni," she sits to him for a statute of "Syrinx," without any Philistine misgiving, her action in offering herself as his model being "spontaneous and perfectly natural." When she sees his first sketch of her pose, she "clasped herself in a rapture of self-love, bending towards it, her lips parted, her eyes enamoured, and fed her soul with adoration."

It is needless to detail further the adventures of the elect Aspasia's soul among the masterpieces and the men. On every page there is pose, and on every other there is chatter about art. The unfortunate Robert Akenside gets her to come out to Rome as his secretary in his work of classical research, and a most insufferable and vulgar girl she soon shows herself, conceited, ill-bred, shrewish, and inordinately vain. And while she is playing off the airs and graces of her "complex personality" on her new admirer, Professor Urbano, and angling furtively after Laleham, the infatuated Akenside receives "intimate confidences that were distractingly sweet," and before him rises hourly the statue of "the little Syrinx with its ineffable allurement, its strange revelation of the mysteries of body and soul, its dual kinship with the world of yesterday and of to-day, and he sank down trembling at the knowledge of all it symbolised." What the statue symbolised, if it were a little better done than the novel, must have been its distressing power of humbugging simple people. For had the author of "Syrinx" possessed the critical faculty, had he wit enough to hide Aspasia's innate vulgarity, her egregious self-adoration, and all the bag of her shallow little tricks, it is quite possible that its art talk and æsthetic pose might have passed with the majority of readers for the real love of what is beautiful. Of real beauty—beauty of spirit and beauty of form—no comprehension is shown in "Syrinx." Unhappily, the influence of such work is by no means insignificant, for the artistic counterfeit that passes current estranges sincere and simple souls from real art and does more than anything to confirm the Philistine in his Philistinism.

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY.

CLOTH 1/- NET. LEATHER 2/- NET.

NOW READY

50 NEW VOLUMES

MAKING FOUR HUNDRED BOOKS FOR EVERYMAN'S CHOICE.

Complete Lists will be sent on request by the Publishers, or may be had of the Booksellers.

Beethoven's Letters

CRITICAL EDITION WITH EXPLANATORY NOTES. BY DR. ALF. CHR. KALISCHER. TRANSLATED WITH PREFACE. By J. S. SHEDLOCK, B.A.

This Edition contains a facsimile in Coloured Photogravure from the famous miniature of Beethoven in his twenty-first year. Facsimiles of Music hitherto unpublished, &c., 2 vols., demy 8vo, 21s. net.

This will be the First Complete English Edition of Beethoven's Letters, and will contain over 1,100 Letters and Notes.

A New Light on the Renaissance

By HAROLD BAYLEY. Super-royal 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. Over 400 Illustrations.

The design of this work is to explain the origin and meaning of the multifarious "trademarks" and decorative designs used by the early printers and papermakers, and as far as possible to recover some of the fragrance with which these neglected emblems were once permeated.

The Mystical Element of Religion Second Edition in the Press.

As studied in the Lives of St. Catherine of Genoa and her Friends. By BARON F. VON HÜGEL. Photogravure Portraits, 2 vols. demy 8vo, 21s. net.

Daily News:—"The most complete and balanced attempt in any language to apply the modern scientific method to all the facts of religion on the grand scale . . . . The best-informed and most inspiring study of religion in our time—a mine for all future workers in that field."

New Things and Old in Saint Thomas Aquinas

A Translation of various Writings and Treatises of the Angelic Doctor. With an Introduction by H. C. O'NEILL. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

This is the first series of Translations from Aquinas in any Language, and also by far the vast majority of extracts here translated have never been done into English before.

The Mediaeval Town Series

A Series of Literary Guide Books.

With numerous Topographical Drawings, Reproductions and Paintings and Sculptures, Maps and Plans. F'cap. 8vo (pocketable). In grey cloth aud limp green paste grain roan binding. Price per volume, cloth, 4s. 6d. net.; roan, 5s. 6d. net.

The Latest Volume just issued is:—

Pisa. By JANET ROSS and NELLY ERICHSEN. Illustrated by NELLY ERICHSEN.

Please write for Catalogue.

J. M. DENT & CO.,

19, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

JUST PUBLISHED.

NINETEENTH CENTURY TEACHERS and OTHER ESSAYS.

By JULIA WEDGWOOD.

A volume of much importance and interest by Julia Wedgwood, who wrote many fine articles in the "Contemporary Review" and in the "Spectator" during the days of Hutton and Townsend, and has consented to the publication of a selection of her essays. These studies of men and manners represent the thoughts and convictions of about thirty years—"convictions illustrated by various circumstances, and experiences, but themselves unchanged except so far as time had deepened and expanded them."

The following chapters are included in the volume:—

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE,
FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE,
THOMAS ERSKINE OF LINLATHEN, LIFE OF CHARLES KINGSLEY,
ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY,
THE CAMBRIDGE APOSTLES OF 1830,
RICHARD HOLT HUTTON,
A STUDY OF CARLYLE,
"THE MAJORITY,"
JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN,
THE MORAL INFLUENCE OF GEORGE ELIOT,
JOHN RUSKIN,
LAURENCE OLIPHANT,
COUNT LEO TOLSTOI,
MORALS AND POLITICS,
ETHICS AND SCIENCE,
BIOGRAPHY,
THE RELATION OF MEMORY TO WILL,
THE VANITY OF MEN OF LETTERS,
INVALIDS,
APOLOGIES,
HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE,
THE UNFAITHFUL STEWARD,
BROTHERS, An Address to Female Students,
DE SENECTUTE,
THE DRAWBACKS OF THE INTELLECTUAL LIFE.

Price 10/6 net.

THE PSYCHOLOGICAL PHENOMENA OF CHRISTIANITY.

By GEORGE BARTON CUTTEN, D.D., Ph.D.

In this interesting and well-studied volume Dr. Cutten examines in outline the whole range of the phenomena of Christianity, abnormal and normal, pathological and healthful. He treats of such subjects as mysticism, ecstacy, visions, dreams, witchcraft, revivals, faith cure and Christian Science, but does not confine his exposition merely to the unusual and the occult in Christianity. The theological student and the general reader will find much profit in reading of this book.

Price 12/- net.

THE LIVING WORD. By the Rev. ELWOOD WORCESTER, D.D., Ph.D.

Dr. Elwood Worcester is the founder of the Emmanuel Church Movement, but unlike his well-known volume "Religion and Medicine," this book is not concerned with the spiritual healing of disorders, half nervous and half moral, but is an attempt to establish from the point of view of modern scientific and philosophic thought, faith in the Living God, and reassurance as to the supreme problems that eternally press on human life. The book is the argument of a strong and simple nature expressed in language of great charm and power.

Price 6/- net.

HODDER & STOUGHTON

WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

In his latest volume, "The Wander Years" (Smith, Elder, 6s. net), Mr. J. H. Yoxall takes the fullest advantage of the essayist's licence to talk at large. While his "wander years" appear to have been spent very largely in France, the memories of things and men encountered there recall so many cognate memories of other countries that the literary result is a more than usually diversified miscellany. People and places, battle-fields, old china, water-colors, heredity—à propos of Goethe—and the House of Commons figure herein; but, perhaps, the character of the volume can be better expressed by quoting the title to Chapter VI., which runs, "From Artois to Liverpool, and by Russia, Battersea, and Fiesole to Fowey," and has a sub-heading entitled "On a platter at Montreuil." Of course, this style of thing is perfectly legitimate, in that it is quite in accordance with classic models; so, too, in places at any rate, is the use of exotic words, and so the degree of whimsicality that out-Lambs Lamb. And yet Mr. Yoxall, in spite of his great fund of miscellaneous scholarship, is hardly as convincing an essayist as the famous prototypes on whom he models himself. The probable reason is his eclecticism. At times he goes a sentimental journey with Sterne, at times he sits in the East India House with Lamb, to emerge for a chat with Sainte-Beuve or Ruskin, or a romp with Dickens; or he joins a party of early nineteenth century British artists in Paris; or he is just an enthusiastic collector of china and other bric-à-brac. We are disposed to think that in the last-named rôle he is most truly himself. Of old china in particular he writes most eloquently and interestingly; he has the history and the beauty of it at his finger-ends, and the touch of the fingers is delicate and suggestive. He tells us that he has collected everything—even battle-fields, metaphorically!—and there is no doubt whatever as to the very catholic sympathies that his wander years bred within him. But while he is just intellectually entertaining on a town, a house, a cathedral, a bit of human history—the study of Rousseau's Madame de Warens is more noteworthy than most, by the way—a piece of Crown Derby or Nantgarw seems to wake his soul, and the result is to make the reader forget his mannerisms. The book, on the whole, is, like many of its words, a trifle exotic, and possibly too much the outcome of a highly cultivated mind, and too little the reflection of personal feeling. This, however, is by no means to say that it is affected, or that it is not a peculiarly courageous attempt to revive the golden, and mostly forgotten, art of essay-writing.

* * *

In "The Public Health Agitation, 1833-48" (A. C. Fifield, 2s. 6d. net) Miss B. L. Hutchins has set out in attractive form the main facts about the origins of humane sanitary legislation in England. A connecting link between Factory Reform, Poor Law Reform, and Sanitary Reform is found in the career of Edwin Chadwick, who, though chiefly known for his decided and vigorous policy in the reorganisation of the Poor Law, is a scarcely less important figure in the development of modern administrative ideas in regard to factory life and the conditions of public health. Chadwick has, indeed, had less than justice done to him in the commonly accepted view of his methods and his aims. Many forget, for example, that he condemned the promiscuous workhouse almost as strongly as the Minority Report; that he was opposed to the giving of useless and degrading work as a test, and that he did not wish to apply the principle of deterrence to children, or to the old, or the sick. He brought down on his head storms of abuse (Disraeli called him "this monster in human shape") partly by his unsympathetic manner and partly by his warfare on abuses. In Factory Reform he made a great advance on Oastler and Sadler in recommending Government inspection. All previous legislation had left supervision to the magistrates and had, in consequence, been quite ineffectual. The idea of paid inspectors had been put into a Bill by Robert Owen, and Miss Hutchins suggests that Chadwick may have heard of it through Bentham, who had at one time been on terms of friendship with Owen. This was infinitely the most important contribution made to Factory Reform, but at the time it was vehemently opposed by many of the Ten Hours propagandists, who thought that the inspectors were sure to be on the side of the manufacturers. The picture of his great public exertions is completed by the account of his work as a Public Health Reformer. He had seen enough of the conditions of England during his survey as a Poor Law Commissioner to realise the hideous state of the homes and streets in which the English poor were doomed to live. When the Poor Law Board was dissolved he threw himself into the great work of the organisation of social reform. His "Report on the Sanitary Condition of the Laboring Classes of Great Britain" marks an epoch in this history of legislative administration for the protection of health. Miss Hutchins has given a clear and readable account of a movement which it is especially interesting to study with the Report of the Second Poor Law Commission in our hands.

* * *

Most missions abroad are devoted so entirely to the regeneration of the colored races that it is rather a relief to read of one that has the white man's moral and spiritual elevation for an objective. The "Brotherhood of the Good Shepherd" has its headquarters at Dubbo, in New South Wales, and the Australian bushman is its care, to the practical exclusion of the aborigines. In "A Parson in the Australian Bush" (Arnold, 6s. net), the Rev. C. H. S. Matthews, late vice-principal of the Brotherhood, which is one of a group of similar bodies now established in Australia, gives a very readable account of his experiences in connection with this body's work. During his journeyings over an immense tract of country he made the acquaintance of several curious characters and encountered some few adventures. He arrived, moreover, at certain conclusions as to the religious needs of the population and the best methods of supplying them, which are here set forth. Incidentally he gives a very outspoken explanation of the comparative failure of his own church, the Anglican, to exercise influence. The parish system, he points out, is impracticable in a country where parish boundaries must often be a hundred miles apart on account of the vast area to be covered by a few clergymen. Another difficulty was found to be the prejudice of the bushman against the parson's visits, arising out of the suspicion—in some cases well-founded—that he came mainly for the sake of the "collection." There are some capital photographic illustrations, and a few not inept sketches by the author. The book is written emphatically from the Australian point of view, and evidences much sympathy with the political, as well as the religious, ideals of a still young nation.

* * *

Mr. Charles E. B. Russell, who is the honorary secretary of the Heywood Street Lads' Club, Ancoats, Manchester, has collaborated with Miss Lilian M. Rigby in the writing of a very practical book on "Working Lads' Clubs" (Macmillan, 5s. net). Boys' clubs already existing in our principal cities are described in considerable detail, and much sound advice is given to those who contemplate starting fresh ones. As regards new enterprise in this direction, the chief thing to remember from the economic point of view would seem to be that the genuine working lads' club can never be entirely self-supporting, since the subscription and tariff must always be low in proportion to the expenses of renting and running the establishment. On the whole the authors are disposed to favor the advantages of the larger clubs as against those of smaller ones, provided that the former are conducted on the right lines. These lines involve the cultivation of personal sympathy between the boys and the officers set over them, the avoidance of anything in the way of religious or other teaching that a boy cannot understand, and so cannot be expected to relish, and, what is most important of all—since it embraces all—the careful study of the physical and mental requirements of boy nature. This book both reveals what has been done by the working lads' clubs movement in the past towards brightening the lives of boys, and guiding them at a critical age, and demonstrates the importance of the question to our race. It enables one to see how a well-managed club can benefit a lad in many ways, besides the direct recreation it gives him; how, in fact, it can exercise an enormous influence over his home life, his work, and his amusements outside what the club provides, and may truly mould his future as a citizen.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it WILL BE REPLACED.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories,
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

FROM SIDGWICK & JACKSON'S LIST.

SAILING SHIPS:

The Story of their Development from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By E. KEBLE CHATTERTON. With over 100 Illustrations from photographs and drawings. Extra Royal 8vo, 320 pps., designed cover in cloth gilt, 16s. net. [In the Press.

Three Plays by GRANVILLE BARKER.

The Marrying of Ann Leete.
The Voysey Inheritance.
Waste.
In one volume, 5s. net; separate plays in cloth, 2s. net; in paper wrappers, 1s. 6d. net. [In the Press.

LAND VALUES TAXATION: THE ESSENTIAL REFORM.

By C. H. CHOMLEY and R. L. OUTHWAITE. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrappers, 1s. net.
A Handbook to an Important Question of the Day, written by experts. [In the Press.

THE POCKET-BOOK SERIES.

1. Famous Poems.
2. Selections from Dickens.
3. Essays on Walking.
Intro. by HILAIRE BELLOC.
F'cap. 8vo, 232 pages, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net. [In the Press.

Complete English Works of THOMAS CAMPION.

Edited by A. H. BULLEN. F'cap 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net. A Pocket Edition of the Poems and Masques, reprinted from Mr. Bullen's editio princeps.

THE BURIAL OF SIR THOMAS MOORE

and Other Poems, by the Rev. CHAS. WOLFE, with a Collotype Facsimile of the Original Manuscript of "The Burial of Sir John Moore." With an Introductory Memoir by C. LITTON FALKINER. 1s. net.

THOMAS STOTHARD, R.A.

His Life and Work. By A. C. COXHEAD. With 53 full-page Illustrations, and cuts in the text. Extra Royal 8vo, cheap edition, 8s. 6d. net.

POPULAR BALLADS

of the Olden Time. Three series, selected and edited by FRANK SIDGWICK. F'cap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net per Vol.

The Letters of JAMES BOSWELL to the Rev. W. J. Temple, with an Introduction by Thomas Seccombe. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"For the real Boswell, in spite of all that he wrote, and that has been written about him, you cannot rightly understand till you have read this life-long epistolary confession."
—The Nation.

Selected Poems by LAURENCE HOUSMAN.

F'cap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. Chosen by the Author from his four previous books of verse.
"Mr. Laurence Housman is a poet some of whose sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought."—Telegraph.

THE LOG OF THE BLUE DRAGON, 1892-1904.

by C. C. LYNAM. Second Edition, revised and enlarged, very fully illustrated. 6s. net.
"The book is crammed full of high spirits and the enjoyment of life."
—Evening Standard.

THE STORY OF AMARYLLIS and other VERSES.

By VIOLA TAYLOR. Square 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
"A piece of delicate tracery in graceful verse."
—Morning Post.

EARLY ENGLISH LYRICS.

Amorous, Divine, Moral and Trivial. Chosen by E. K. CHAMBERS and F. SIDGWICK. F'cap. 8vo, 6s. net.
"It is a work of true scholarship, as well as of distinguished literary skill."
—Manchester Guardian.

THE COURT THEATRE, 1904-1907.

A Criticism and Commentary, by DESMOND MACCARTHY. With an Appendix of Reprinted Programmes of the Vedrenne-Barker Management. Imperial 16mo, 2s. 6d. net.

PRUNELLA; or LOVE in a Dutch Garden.

By LAURENCE HOUSMAN and GRANVILLE BARKER. With a Frontispiece. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net; art wrappers, 2s. net; paper cover, 1s.

THE SEVEN DEADLY SINS.

By FREDERICK ROGERS. Extra demy 8vo, 5s. net.
Notes and Queries says:—"A most charming book . . . adorned by excellent engravings."

3, ADAM STREET, ADELPHI, LONDON, W.C.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning. March 5.	Price Friday morning, March 12.
Consols 2½ per cent.	83⅞	84 1/16
German 3 per cent.	86	86
Caledonian	88	89½
U.S. Steel Pref.	113½	112¾
Union Pacific	179½	179
Erie 1st Pref.	42½	38¼

The City has enjoyed a quiet and uneventful week. The Board of Trade returns for February are fairly encouraging compared with February of last year, which had an extra working day. The imports of raw material are quite promising, and our emporium trade in re-exports is actually better than at this time last year. This trade in re-exports, by the way, would be practically killed by Tariff Reform. A good deal of anxious curiosity is being aroused about the Budget, which may be introduced before Easter. A deficit of fifteen millions, of which ten or twelve would have to be raised in new taxation, is a rather appalling prospect. The deficit, of course, may be rather less; but, in any case, it will require all the ingenuity of Mr. Lloyd George to devise the necessary ways and means.

Chinese Railway Loans.

The City is considerably perturbed about Chinese railways, for which some nine or ten millions of capital have already been raised in England. The interest on the loans is secured first on the profits on the lines, and, secondly, on a guarantee of the Chinese Government. But when the Chinese build the railways themselves the money seems to go anywhere but into the construction of the line, so that the first security becomes no security at all. And if this new system of Chinese railway directors goes on the Imperial Government may not be able to find the interest on these loans. The moral seems to be that British firms should have nothing to do with Chinese Railway loans until adequate guarantees are given that the lines shall be honestly constructed under the competent control of European engineers.

Wheat Prices and the Maize Crop.

Last week the "Gazette" price of English wheat was 34s. 5d. per quarter, compared with 30s. 11d. this time last year, and 26s. 9d. in March, 1906. These high prices are of ill omen for other trades, which are bound to suffer when the first necessaries of life rise in price. In the old days of Protection it was noticed that in years when the price of corn went up wages went down, and vice versâ. Last year, owing mainly to the failure of the Indian and Australian harvests, the world's crop was short and wheat reserves were depleted. The world's maize crop was also deficient. Reckoning in quarters of eight bushels, the three chief exporters of maize in 1907 and 1908 were the United States, Argentina, and Russia, as follows:—

	1907.	1908.
United States	9,585,000	4,315,000
Argentina	5,950,000	7,845,000
Russia	4,200,000	2,500,000

The extraordinary thing about maize is the gigantic production of the United States, which accounts for just three-fourths of the whole maize crop of the world. Thus, for 1908, the total crop is estimated at 405 million quarters, to which the United States contributed 308 million quarters. Hungary was a poor second with 17 millions, and Argentina third with 15 millions. The United Kingdom is the largest importer of maize. We took 7,895,000 quarters in 1908, against 12,450,000 quarters in 1907. Germany's figures for the two years were 3,080,000 and 5,750,000. The fall in imports is accounted for by the high prices, which led farmers to economise in their use of Indian corn.

More Railway Economies.

The Scotch railway reports issued this week record economies even more remarkable than those of the English lines. The management of the various Scotch systems has for years been a subject of rather fierce criticism, and shareholders will probably be surprised at the saving effected since the slump in traffics first began. Whether the directors can continue these economies, or whether future half-years will have to pay for present retrenchment, is a doubtful point. Anyhow, it is worth noting that four companies, with a loss of £154,000 in gross, had a gain of nearly £27,000 in net—a gain that is only partly due to the lower price of coal. From an analysis of the reports, I should say that the systems have, for the most part, been well maintained, but that the service of the lines has been very considerably reduced, the wages bills of the four companies having fallen by some £50,000. Here again we shall have to wait and see whether the reduction is part of a new policy, or is only a temporary economy due to the smaller quantity of freight handled. To run the lines permanently with a smaller staff may be justifiable, but a policy of this kind can obviously become dangerous both to the public and to the company's servants. The dividends declared remain in every case at last year's rate, and the Scotch directors may claim that in this respect at least they have beaten their contemporaries across the Border. The following table shows the amounts of the different stocks and the sums distributed on them:—

	Amount of Stock. £		Div. p.c. per annum.
Caledonian Preferred Conv....	13,480,400	.....	3
,, Deferred Conv....	13,480,400	.....	Nil
Glasgow and S.W. Pref. Conv.	6,106,270	.....	2½
,, Def. Conv.	6,106,270	.....	1
Great North of Scotland Preferred Conv.	1,063,653	.....	3
Great North of Scotland Def. Conv.	1,666,475	.....	½
North British Pref. Ord.....	9,568,336	.....	3
,, Def. Ord.	11,990,821	.....	¼
	63,462,225

Of this 63½ millions of stock "water" accounts for not much less than half. The dividend announcements have had a very good effect on the market:—

	Jan. 1.	Mar. 10.
Caledonian Pref. Conv.	61¾	66¾	+5
North British Pref. Ord.....	65	69	+4

The dispute between the traders and the companies over the question of demurrage still remains unsettled.

Mocha Coffee.

One often hears it said that no genuine Arabian coffee is to be had, and that the coffee which comes to London and New York as "Mocha coffee" is at best only Brazilian coffee shipped to Arabia and reshipped thence. But the Aden Chamber of Commerce declares that "the coffee exported from Aden all comes from the Yemen district of Arabia and the Harrar district of Abyssinia, and was formerly exported from Mocha. It now finds its way through the ports of Hodeidah and Aden."

> "This chamber has for the past twenty-one years jealously guarded the reputation of this coffee, which forms such an important item in the trade of the port, and it is an absolute untruth, as can be conclusively proved at any time from the Government records here, that any other kinds of coffee are brought here. Consequently there can be no such re-exportation as is alleged."

I see that in the declared exports to the United States through the American Consulate at Aden coffee has been a variable factor. For the fiscal year ended June 30th, 1907, the amount was 471,602 dol., against 261,104 dol. in 1906 and 308,088 dol. in 1905. The total imports of coffee into the United States average over 70,000,000 dol. a year. The total shipments of coffee from Aden to all parts amount to about 1,500,000 dol. a year. The immense consumption of coffee in the United States offers the Taft Administration a fine source of revenue. But a coffee duty would be very unpopular; though it might be beneficial if it checked the consumption of strong coffee—a favorite American vice.

Lucellum.

LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each. Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,600,000.

Directors.

Hon. Sir ERIC BARRINGTON, K.C.B.
JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.
Right Hon. Viscount GOSCHEN.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.
WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.
Sir THOMAS JACKSON, Bart.
WM. McKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.

Auditors.

HENRY GRANT, Esq. THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq.

Hon. STUART PLEYDELL-BOUVERIE.

Head Office Manager—HERMAN RICHARD WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—FREDERICK JAMES BARTHORPE.
Country Manager—WILLIAM GEORGE GRIBBLE.
Chief Inspector—FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT.
Chief Accountant—THEOPHILUS JAMES CARPENTER.
Secretary—EDGAR FRANCIS ROBINSON.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.

Foreign Exchange Office—80, Cornhill, E.C.

266 Branches in London and Country.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms. Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS made to all parts of the World.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given or the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

TOURS.

The R.M.S. DUNOTTAR CASTLE (of the Union-Castle Line) is chartered for a series of cruises as follows :—

£21 0s. 0d. ATHENS, TUNIS, CARTHAGE, MALTA, THE GREEK ISLES, April 8th.

£14 14s. 0d. PALERMO, TUNIS, ALGIERS, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, LISBON, April 28th.

Full particulars from Dr. H. S. LUNN, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

MISCELLANEOUS.

COATS OF ARMS and PEDIGREES.—The Author of "A List of Emigrant Ministers to America" will send free to any interested n circular on the legal right to arms.—GERALD FOTHERGILL, 11, Brussels-road, New Wandsworth.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

THIS IS THE TIME OF YEAR WHEN

Liver troubles

ARE MORE PREVALENT.

If the Liver is weak, the change from Summer to Autumn, renders it incapable of performing its duties, and the result is, an accumulation of bile in the blood which causes depression, irritability, and may develop into Dropsy.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets

STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

will quickly and positively cure all Liver disorders, When the valuable curative and tonic properties they contain, are absorbed into the system, the circulation carries them direct to the Liver, where they stimulate this organ to perform its duties naturally, and strengthen it to maintain health action. MERIT'S LIVERETS are prepared as prescribed by an eminent Physician, from purely vegetable ingredients. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists and Stores, or if unable to obtain, send direct to

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name "MERIT'S LIVERETS." and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Spurious imitations will not cure you.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING

Don't say you do not like Cocoa until you have tasted Rowntree's — it's different

Rowntree's Cocoa

ELECT

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.
Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.
A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.
A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.
SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN MARCH.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.
Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.
THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified resident, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature. Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.
Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.
Preparation for London Matriculation, 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.
In the South of Cheshir four miles from Crewe. Opened 1900. Modern Buildings with 24 acres of grounds. A Preparatory School in immediate connection with the Present School will be opened in May. Next Entrance Examination for both Schools, April 2nd, at the School. Application should be made to the HEADMASTER, or to the CLERK TO THE GOVERNORS, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT
(THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL).
Entrance Scholarship Examination, March 24th and following days. Apply Headmaster, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.
Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

For copies of prospectus, with illustrations of the School Exhibit in the Franco-British Exhibition, apply to the Head Master.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698 "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauser Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

Tettenhall College, Staffs.

For Prospectus, Illustrated Booklet, List of Honours, etc., apply to the Headmaster, R. L. AGER, M.A., late Exhibitioner of Rugby School, and Scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS, Near Birmingham.
BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.
Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.
THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.
Messrs. J. and J. PATON having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.
Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.
ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.
Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations 30 minutes from London.
Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,

Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 „ ... ... 6d. „

FROM CHATTO & WINDUS'S LIST.

NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE MAKING.

By C. J. HOLMES, M.A.,

Slade Professor of Fine Arts in the University of Oxford.
With a Photogravure Frontispiece.
Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

Many books have been written for the use of elementary students but very few are of much service to the painter when his student days are over. It is to the student rather than to the mere beginner that Professor Holmes's book is addressed. His object has been to discuss in clear and orderly fashion the thousand and one problems of style and technique with which an artist is nowadays confronted, and to indicate the lines on which personal taste and talent may be most successfully developed.

THE KING'S CLASSICS.

GENERAL EDITOR, PROFESSOR I. GOLLANCZ, LITT.D.

Printed on antique laid paper, 16mo. (4½ by 6 inches) gilt tops, and each volume contains a photogravure frontispiece. Quarter bound, antique grey boards or red cloth, 1s. 6d. net; quarter vellum, grey cloth sides, 2s. 6d. net; special three-quarter vellum, Oxford side-papers, gilt tops, silk marker, 5s. net.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

56. THE CAVALIER TO HIS LADY.
An Anthology of XVIIth Century Love Songs. Selected and edited by FRANK SIDGWICK. Coloured Frontispiece after BYAM SHAW, R.I.

61. THE BOOK OF THE DUKE OF TRUE LOVERS.
A Romance of the Court, now first translated from the unique MS. in the Middle French by CHRISTINE DE PISAN, with Notes and Introduction, by ALICE KEMP-WELCH.

62. OF THE TUMBLER OF OUR LADY, AND OTHER MIRACLES.
Now first translated from the Middle French MSS. anonymous and by GAUTIER DE COINCI (preserved at Soissons), with Notes and Introduction, by ALICE KEMP-WELCH.

63. THE CHATELAINE OF VERGI.
A Romance of the Court, translated from the Middle French by ALICE KEMP-WELCH, with introduction by L. BRANDIN, Ph.D., and with the original Text, édition Raynaud.

THE WORKS OF JANE AUSTEN.

In 10 Volumes, each illustrated with 10 Reproductions after Water-colours by A. WALLIS MILLS. With Bibliographical and Biographical Notes, by R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON. Small crown 8vo, coloured tops, cloth, with special binding design and picture End-papers, 3s. 6d. net per vol.
Also the Set of 10 Volumes, bound in whole white or green parchment, £3 net per set. Sold in sets only.

Vols. I. and II.	PRIDE AND PREJUDICE.
Vols. III. and IV.	SENSE AND SENSIBILITY.
Volume V.	NORTHANGER ABBEY.
Volume VI.	PERSUASION.
Vols. VII. and VIII.	EMMA.
Vols. IX. and X.	MANSFIELD PARK.

"The type is admirably clear, and the illustrations are truly Georgian."—Spectator.

"That such a handsome and desirable new edition of Jane Austen should be issued now is witness to the vitality of her charm and the enterprise of the publishers . . . unusually well printed. . . . The series of coloured illustrations are admirably conceived and well produced."—Burlington Magazine.

NEW 3s. 6d. NOVELS.

THE WATERS OF DESTRUCTION. By ALICE PERRIN.
RED RECORDS. By ALICE PERRIN.
JOHN CALDIGATE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE.
FOR LOVE AND HONOUR. By FRANK BARRETT.
THE SANYASI. By F. E. PENNY.
CASTLE AND CREED. By F. E. PENNY.
TRACKED TO DOOM. By DICK DONOVAN.
GWENDOLINE'S HARVEST. By JAMES PAYN.
WHAT OUGHT SHE TO DO? By FLORENCE WARDEN.
AN INDUSTRIOUS CHEVALIER. By S. SQUIRE SPRIGGE.

IDOLATRY

By ALICE PERRIN,

Author of "The Stronger Claim," "The Waters of Destruction," &c.

Third Impression. 6s.

"In book after book she has drawn vivid, incisive sketches of not only Anglo-Indian, but native life. . . . 'Idolatry' is a real triumph."—The Times.

JULIAN REVELSTONE

By JUSTIN McCARTHY, Author of "Dear Lady Disdain," "A History of Our Own Times," &c.

Second Impression. 6s.

"Unflagging interest is maintained with never-failing skill."—Scotsman.

"There is a sweetness and healthfulness about the whole narrative."—Outlook.

A QUESTION OF MEANS

By M. B. CROSS,

Author of "Love and Olivia.'

Second Impression. 6s.

"This is a quite admirable novel, which gathers strength and interest as it goes along, till it absolutely absorbs the reader, and leaves him at the end in a very grateful mood to the talented authoress."—Daily Telegraph.

THE ROGUE OF RYE

By W. WILLMOTT DIXON. 6s.

"The tale is really exciting and full of the complications, dangers, escapes, fighting, and love, which go to make up an historical romance. This one is capital."—Daily Telegraph.

A CASTLE OF DREAMS

By NETTA SYRETT,

Author of "The Child of Promise," "Anne Page," &c. 6s.

A half-ruined mediæval castle in the wilds of Ireland is the scene of this modern romance, which presents a strange and alluring blend of reality and Celtic imagination.

THE JUNE PRINCESS

By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY,

Author of "An April Princess." 6s.

"A decidedly original composition . . . one will soon become enamoured of the freshness of the story, the wise and merry discussions, and the curious people who wander up and down the pages."—Daily Telegraph.

THE MERRY HEART

By FRANK A. SWINNERTON. 6s.

"A study of clerk life, male and female, steady and flighty, drawn with a sure and dexterous hand."—Times.

THE PAINTED MOUNTAIN

By PETER LAURISTOUN. 6s.

THE ROAD OF NO RETURN

By A. C. INCHBOLD,

Author of "Under the Syrian Sun," "Lisbon and Cintra," &c. 6s. [March 18th.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 110 & 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. IV., No. 25.] SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Diary of the Week ...	913
Politics and Affairs:—
A Scare and Its Makers	916
The Impotence of Europe	918
The New American Tariff	919
The Logic of Woman's Suffrage	920
Life and Letters:—
The Good and the Beautiful	922
The "Iliad" as a Whole	923
The Mind of the Apes ...	924
Present-Day Problems:—
The Slavery of the Cocoa Islands. By Henry W. Nevinson ...	925
The Drama:—
"One Law for Man——" By William Archer ...	926
Letters from Abroad:—
Arms and the Bill. By Ed. Bernstein ...	927
Communications:—
Are "Dreadnoughts" Worthless? By C. E. Kelway	929
Letters to the Editor:—
Conscription. By S. C. E. Maurice, W. A. Jolly, and Charles Cecil ...	930
The Evasion of the Small Holdings Act. By Philip Morrell, M.P. ...	932
The Central Glasgow Election. By J. W. Cleland, M.P.	932
"The Paralysis of Satire." By R. H. Kidd ...	932
The University of London Commission. By Professor G. Carey Foster and Professor Kirsopp Lake ...	933
A Defect in the Death Duties. By D. B. McLaren ...	933
Hare Hunting at Eton. By C. S. ...	933
The Education of Turkish Women. By Isabel Fry ...	934
Poetry:—
The Suburb. By S. R. Littlewood ...	934
The World of Books ...	935
Books to be Read ...	935
Reviews:—
The Story of the "Noetics"	936
Napoleon's Chamberlain ...	937
A Sociological Dictionary	938
An Artist and Another ...	938
Books in Brief:—
Christianity in the First Three Centuries ...	939
Letters from an American Farmer ...	940
An Historical Introduction to the Marprelate Tracts ...	940
General Lee: Man and Soldier	940
A Sister of Prince Rupert ...	940
English Church Architecture	942
Insurance:—
A Revolution in Fire Protection	942
The Week in the City. By Lucellum ...	944

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Navy Estimates were issued on Friday week. They represent a total of £35,142,700, being an increase of £2,823,000 on last year's provision, and of £1,340,000 in the shipbuilding vote. Thus all hope of economy, and probably of a programme of social reform, disappears. The new construction consists of four "Dreadnoughts," six protected cruisers, twenty destroyers, and many submarines—a fleet in itself. The plan of the Cabinet in view of the German programme is disclosed by the proposal of the House of Commons to allow the Government to collect materials for, and generally to prepare for the construction of, four more "Dreadnoughts" to be laid down on the 1st of April, 1910, and finished by March, 1912. These four ships have, of course, nothing to do with this year's programme. The proposal simply gives the Government power to make an earlier beginning with the programme of 1910, provided the Cabinet decides that such acceleration is necessary. The number of ships to be laid down in 1910 is, of course, a matter for future settlement. In pursuance of this plan of speeding up, two of this year's "Dreadnoughts" are to be laid down in July, and the other two in November. They will, therefore, be all commissioned by the end of 1911 or the beginning of 1912, giving us 18 "Dreadnoughts," including the two "Nelsons," to Germany's normal 13, or 22 if the "speeding up" proposal holds, and we are afraid that Germany will then have 17 leviathans. This implies a further increase of from two to three millions on the shipbuilding vote.

The House of Commons and the Liberal Party generally accepted this programme, but, unfortunately, a highly sensational turn was given to the announcement of it on Tuesday—a form more suited to the larger demands of the Admiralty which the Cabinet finally rejected. Mr. McKenna, in a clear and able, but thoroughly alarmist speech, stated that the Admiralty now expected the German ships of 1908-9 to be finished in 1910, and that the Germans had begun to collect materials and to make turrets, guns, gun-mountings, and armaments for the 1909-10 ships, of which they had laid down one, and possibly two. Later on the Prime Minister declared that this latter fact was made known to the Government last November, and that it was a "great surprise," a "most grave discovery." He and Mr. McKenna also announced that we no longer possessed our former superior speed in "Dreadnought" building, though, as Germany has not yet built a single "Dreadnought," we do not see how such a comparison can be made.

* * *

The sum of these suggestions was that Germany might in the spring of 1912 possess seventeen "Dreadnoughts," to our twenty, or twenty-two plus the "Nelsons"—not in itself an alarming calculation. But Mr. Asquith added that the German Government had given us a "most distinct declaration" that there would be no acceleration of their programme; while Admiral von Tirpitz stated on the following day, in the Reichstag, that Germany, so far from having seventeen "Dreadnoughts" in the spring of 1912 would only possess thirteen in the autumn of that year. Mr. Balfour, out-Heroding Herod, produced a series of unintelligible calculations that she would then have twenty-one or twenty-five. It has yet to be shown that she has done anything secret or unusual. This question the Government can test under their wise proposal to put forward the programme of 1910, or hold it over to the normal time according to necessity.

* * *

These announcements fell on the House of Commons like a thunderbolt. Alarm was universal. Mr. Harvey's amendment was abruptly withdrawn, and the only protest came through the Labor Party's determination to resist the Speaker's leaving the chair. Eighty-three members joined in this protest, including thirty-two Liberals, stalwarts of peace and their principles, against 322 supporters of the Government. But after Mr. Asquith's foreboding speech, debate all but dried up. One or two grave and troubled remonstrances came from the Irish and Labor benches, and Mr. J. M. Robertson made an impressive statement of the reasonable excuse for German shipbuilding given by our insistence on the right of capturing merchant shipping. Mr. Dillon, in a speech of equal power and truth, regarded the way in which both Front Benches pointed the Estimates solely at Germany as "most ominous and grave," and said that such methods and language were heralds of a storm. The Prime Minister talked as if we had nothing but "Dreadnoughts," and as if Germany were almost on an equality with us. This was the way to create panic. Mr. Henderson pertinently asked whether Admiral von Tirpitz's statement in the Reichstag did not destroy the assumption on which Mr. McKenna's calculations were based. The debate, he said, represented the triumph of the Navy League and the definite abandonment of peace, retrenchment, and reform.

* * *

On Thursday the Government reaped what it had sown. The Opposition, throwing all pretence of "patriotism" aside, devoted itself to making party scores. Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Law pressed the point that the Prime Minister, while nominally upholding the two-Power standard, had talked as if we possessed barely a one-Power advantage over Germany. "You say you were caught napping last autumn: have we any guarantee that you are right now in your calculations of German shipbuilding power and its possible accelerations?" they asked. Mr. Bonar Law, confronted with Admiral von Tirpitz's express declarations, made the shameful retort that he did not believe them, as they came from a Power with which we might soon be at war.

* * *

Finally, the Liberals, recovering somewhat from their panic of Tuesday, began to see the scare in its true proportions, Mr. Lough declaring stoutly that Admiral von Tirpitz had made a "bogey" of the whole affair, and Sir Brampton Gurdon deploring the fact that the Estimates had destroyed the paupers' hopes of relief under the Pensions Act. Mr. Balfour finally asked Mr. Asquith to pledge himself that the four conditional "Dreadnoughts" should absolutely be laid down in the first months of 1910—a pledge which the Prime Minister wisely declined to give. Mr. McKenna finally contributed to the calming of the storm which his and the Prime Minister's speeches had raised, by assuring the House that we had gained by holding our hands last year, and that the "improved" "Dreadnoughts" were 30 per cent. stronger than the original type!

* * *

The effects of the naval scare were speedily seen in the Prime Minister's reply to a very powerful deputation which waited on him on Thursday and asked for additional Exchequer grants in aid of the new charges on the educational authorities—medical inspection and treatment and the feeding of school children—which recent legislation has put on them. Mr. Asquith could promise nothing, though the deputation would have been content with half-a-million, one quarter of the price of a "Dreadnought."

* * *

There has been a brisk competition in panic-mongering during the week. On Sunday Mr. Stead, who is now temporarily resting from his "pilgrimage of peace," announced, in "Lloyd's News," that Germany possessed eighteen slips for the building of "Dreadnoughts" and we only possess nine. On Wednesday, Mr. McKenna showed that both these statements were untrue. He stated that we had seventeen such slips, and that, in some months, we should possess two more in Government yards, and several more in private yards. Germany, on the other hand, had only fourteen such slips, and two more under construction. Most of Mr. Stead's statements were as baseless as those with which we have dealt. On Thursday morning, the veteran sensationalist was reinforced by Mr. Frederic Harrison, who having, as he says, for forty years raised his voice against Imperialism and Militarism, now proceeds to raise it in favor of these two causes. Mr. Harrison's remedy for the imminent German invasion, which the War Office at Berlin has planned out to the last detail, is a great land force, but he leaves unsettled the trifling detail whether this army is to be obtained by forced or free service, and what good it will be when we have got it.

* * *

Finally, Lord Rosebery, without whom no scare is complete, came panting at the heels of Mr. Maxse and Mr. Stead, armed with a breathless series of questions to the editor of the "Times." Lord Rosebery professed to think the question of the Navy was "secure," but he also thought it had been "relegated to the region of doubt." He was therefore constrained to ask whether our arrangements for "Territorial defence" were "adequate," and "whether the Territorial Army, even if its ranks be full, be sufficient." Here, unfortunately, Lord Rosebery's letter to the "Times" came to an abrupt end, as Lord Rosebery's excursions into politics are apt to do. We suppose the answer, like the instalment of a sensational story, will be "continued in our next."

* * *

The week has been full of alarums in the Balkans and the newspapers have suddenly become profoundly pessimistic, for reasons of which it is impossible to see the adequacy. On Monday the Servian Government despatched its reply to the Austrian note presented by Count Forgach. The Servian reply refers to the previous circular sent to all the Powers, and, for the rest, is limited to a suggestion that the commercial treaty should be submitted to the Austro-Hungarian Parliaments for ratification. The Austrian Premier has declared that the note does not correspond to Austrian expectations, and that the economic question will not be touched until Servia abandons evasion and clarifies her point of view. Apparently what Austria wants is that Servia should, in so many words, abandon all claims arising out of Bosnia, promise to be of good behavior, and settle her differences direct.

* * *

As far as one can see with clearness, Servia has already taken the first two of these steps, but boggles rather at the third. Still the responsible Austrian Press does not talk of war, nor does there seem any real ground for fearing it, especially as the Powers are about to intervene again to give prudent counsel at Belgrade. Nevertheless, the newspapers profess to entertain the gravest apprehensions, and a Slavophil manifesto of fiery sympathy with Servia is being circulated in Russia and has already received numerous signatures in the Duma. Russia and Turkey have signed a draft agreement with regard to the compensation payable by Bulgaria. Russia is not to abandon all her indemnity annuities, but only enough to raise £5,000,000 at 5 per cent.; the remaining annuities, however, may be liquidated at 4 per cent. This agreement will have to be ratified by the Turkish Parliament, where it is pretty certain to be severely criticised.

* * *

The French Post Office employees have been restless for some time; their chief grievance is a new promotion scheme, which substitutes merit—which in France too often means favoritism—in large measure for seniority. A deputation on Saturday put the employees' case before the Ministry, got no satisfaction, and made a demonstration at the Central Telegraph Office in Paris, which has grievances of its own. As a result, some were arrested, and on Monday sentenced to six days' imprisonment, and others were suspended. On Monday night a meeting of 6,000 postal servants in Paris decided to strike. On Tuesday the postmen—who are taking the lead in the movement—left work, while the Central Telegraph Office was without telegraphists. The strike has continued since at Paris: millions of letters remain undelivered, and the telegraphic service between Paris and foreign countries has been seriously deranged. The agitation is likely to spread to the provinces, and the postal workers at Havre, Lille, Brest, and Lyons have announced their solidarity with their Parisian comrades. The Government is resolute: there have been numerous arrests and suspensions, and M. Simyan, the Under-Secretary for the Post Office, has delivered himself of harsh words. The general attitude of the Press is that the postal servants have real grievances, but have gone the wrong way to work to get them remedied.

* * *

The Naval crisis in the French Cabinet has been settled by a compromise. M. Picard, the Navy Minister, wanted £9,000,000 to put the fleet and supplies in an efficient state, quite apart from possible demands for new construction. The £9,000,000 was to be spread over several years, but £3,500,000 was to be provided in the current Budget. M. Caillaux, the Finance Minister, resisted these demands. The deficit this year is certain to be more than £5,000,000 and, apart from this, there is not the slightest guarantee that money voted for the Navy will not be wasted. A report just presented to the Chamber reveals an appalling state of incompetence, disorder, and corruption in the Navy Department. "Millions," it says, "have been thrown away by the hundred." These revelations and the pressure of Socialists and advanced Radicals, who realise that what goes to the Navy is taken from social reform, strengthened M. Caillaux's hands, and the compromise is distinctly in his favor. Not £9,000,000, but £7,500,000 is to be spent, and of this only £2,400,000 in the next two years. This means that the Government really makes itself responsible only for £2,400,000, and even before this sum is spent there is to be an inquiry into the Navy Department by a special extra-Parliamentary Commission, the majority of the members of which are not officials of the Department.

* * *

Last Saturday's reports viâ St. Petersburg declared that a rising in Teheran was inevitable, and at the same time it was announced that after a Council the Russian Government had decided to send 100 Cossacks to Teheran, to increase the Consular Guards in other towns, and to instruct the Russian Consuls at Resht and Astrabad to summon warships in the event of disturbances. These measures can be intended to produce only one effect—to intimate to the Nationalists that Russia is behind the Shah; besides amounting to a thinly disguised intervention they make more probable the sort of "episode" which excuses intervention. Within Persia the situation remains practically unchanged. The Royalists operating outside Tabriz have cut the Indo-European telegraph and isolated the town, and they have captured Salfa, burned a good few villages, and massacred many men, women, and children; but the city, though suffering privation, is in no danger of being carried by assault, while the Royalist forces may break up. On Tuesday the State summoned a council of citizens to draft the outlines of a Constitution, but this assembly of servile instruments got together on the suggestion of the Shah's most reactionary advisers deceives nobody.

* * *

The great British cocoa firms have this week made public a firm and most important decision on the subject of the cultivation of cocoa in the Portuguese islands of San Thomé and Principe, in the Gulf of Guinea. After discovering for themselves, by means of prolonged missions to these islands and to the mainland of Angola, conducted by Mr. Burtt and Mr. Wm. Cadbury, and by repeated representations to the Portuguese Government, that the condition of the Angola laborers was largely one of slavery, and that the pledges of reforms had not been fulfilled, they have stopped all their purchases of cocoa. They add that they will not resume them until they are satisfied that the laborers have full freedom to enter into contracts and a full opportunity of returning home when they expire. This decision has been arrived at by Messrs. Cadbury, Messrs. Fry, and Messrs. Rowntree, and also by the great foreign firm of Messrs. Stollwerck, together with some minor producers. We are sorry to hear that some of the Continental and American firms, including the house of Baker, have, up to the present, stood out from this engagement. We hope that American public opinion, which is still, we are sure, keen on the question of slavery, will bring about the adherence of these and other firms.

* * *

We are glad to be able to state that the Alliance Assurance Company has abandoned its announced policy of forcing its clerks to join the Territorial Army. We are informed that, as a matter of fact, no pressure has as yet been put upon any member of the staff, and no new employee will be required to join as a condition of service. We think this is a very good instance of the way in which conscription is sure to break down when put to a practical test. In the first place, the people will not stand it, and, in the second place, the conditions of our commercial life do not permit it. Even if the Alliance Assurance Company had coerced its inside staff, how could it have dealt with its outside representatives?

* * *

Mr. Arnold Forster died on Friday after a long period of enfeebled health. His characteristic energy of mind remained to the last, for we have on our shelves an unsparing attack from his pen on the organisation of the Territorial Army. Mr. Forster's political father was the famous member for Bradford, and, though "W. E." was much the greater of the two men, they resembled each other in a certain harshness of mental outline and temper. In a sense Mr. Forster was a seeker after truth, but he was not of the temperament of those who find it. Thus his pamphlets, such as "The Truth About the Navy" and "The Truth About the Land League," were mere effective statements of a partisan view of these subjects. Without geniality in controversy, Mr. Forster had more industry and conscience than belong to many public men, and, on the other hand, less of the average tact of his class. Both at the Admiralty and at the War Office he showed conspicuous grasp of detail, and an equally marked failure to expound or achieve policy. Perhaps his best work was the kind of journalism which approaches without reaching the standard of literature. Privately he displayed many of the amiable qualities to which his demeanor in Parliament and rigid habit of political thought gave little scope in public life.

* * *

The charge of fraud against Mr. Bottomley collapsed completely after two City magistrates had been incapacitated, and a third had been called in. We confess that we never divined the exact character of the crimes laid to Mr. Bottomley's charge, though one hundred witnesses were summoned to support them. But we are quite clear that Treasury prosecutions should not be conducted in the spirit and temper which Mr. Avory showed, not only on this occasion, but in the Druce case. We are not surprised that such a line failed; we wonder on what theory of the Public Prosecutor's duties it was set up.

Politics and Affairs.

A SCARE AND ITS MAKERS.

> "We need not maunder in ante-chambers to discover differences in the Cabinet, when we have a patriotic Prime Minister appealing to the spirit of the country; and when at the same time we find his Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose duty it is to supply the ways and means by which those exertions are to be supported, proposing votes with innuendo, and recommending expenditure in a whispered invective."—Disraeli on the relations between Palmerston and Gladstone in the Cabinet of 1860.

It is some consolation for those who follow public opinion through its present phase of delirium about the Navy to remind themselves that the country has gone through it all before. We doubt if a single phrase, argument, appeal, innuendo, which has been used during the week to create and swell the German panic was not used in the cause of the three French panics which Cobden described, and, with Gladstone's help, destroyed, in the middle years of last century. Does the First Lord of the Admiralty produce figures suggesting that the German and English Fleets would soon be so near parity that the line of danger had been approached? His predecessors of the 'fifties and 'sixties, Liberal and Tory, did the same. Does the Prime Minister select one type of ship in order to enhance the suggestion of equality, and leave out all the rest? So did the administrators of the earlier panic years. Does he speak with bated breath of private and important intelligence that the rival Power was speeding up its shipbuilding? So, totidem verbis, did our statesmen and administrators fifty years ago. Does a Labor member describe Germany as a "burglar"? A distinguished clergyman used the same word in 1860 of our French friends. Does the Press discuss plans of invasion, and Mr. Frederic Harrison declare that "every road, well, bridge, and smithy in the east of England and Scotland has been docketed in the German War Office"? Cobden records a score such "gobemoucheries" to the discredit of the French. As we speak of the Kaiser now, so we spoke of Louis Napoleon then. Even the more cheering features of the situation are reproduced. For while we accused the French of preparing an invading Armada under the cover of her dockyards and arsenals, she, like Germany, was all the while building under a declared programme, extending over a long term of years, and when her good faith was questioned, proffered the most explicit assurances and contradictions, and even opened her dockyards to the view of British members of Parliament. Germany, we hope, will complete the parallel, and play all her cards on the table, as a more ambitious and doubtful statesmanship played them in 1860. And, finally, if we have a Palmerstonian Prime Minister pressing the case for enlarged armaments, we have, thank God, a Gladstonian Chancellor of the Exchequer laboring valiantly, and not alone, in the double cause of economy and peace.

We have, therefore, to deal not merely with a set of material facts about the Navy, but with a condition of the public mind which calls, we think, for treatment widely different from that which the Prime Minister applied to it. Of the Estimates we make no great complaint. They were not, it is obvious, those which were first presented to the Cabinet, and their purport is clear and unmistakeable. Four "Dreadnoughts" and a large complement of cruisers are to be laid down this year, and two of them are to be laid down earlier than usual. If, on further information and consideration, the Cabinet think it necessary to expedite the programme for next year, materials are to be collected in the opening months of 1910, so as to enable four more "Dreadnoughts" to be begun on the first day of the new financial year. This would appear to be a fair adaptation of the German plans of giving reality to the actual process of "laying down" a new vessel. Beyond this no commitment is made. The Admiralty will have to state to the Cabinet its reasons for asking for this anticipation of the more regular dates of construction. It will only obtain its assent if it can produce evidence of such an acceleration of German plans as would enable her to produce seventeen "Dreadnoughts" in the early months of 1912. If there is no such acceleration, and the proportion of "Dreadnoughts," which both parties tacitly accept as sufficient for the date in question—namely, eighteen to thirteen—remains practically certain, the programme for 1910 will be decided and initiated in the normal manner. The race in armaments will go on, unchecked by the wisdom of statesmanship, but the two countries may hope to reach its most critical stage without a conflict.

This, then, is the normal Anglo-German situation, and it contains the distinct element of promise that the arrangement which the peace party in the Cabinet have brought about offers time for the dissipation of errors, not to say of falsities, and for some such declarations of German good faith as France was willing to afford Cobden and Palmerston in 1860. But a graver complexion attaches to the tone and method of the kind of Council of War set up between the two Front Benches on Tuesday afternoon. We do not greatly complain of the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty. We know these First Lords. They are all alike. Turn the stiffest economist and the most inveterate pacifist loose into the fascinating society of Admirals, and he becomes an enthusiast, not only for armaments in the abstract, but for the precise type of armament on which his "experts" momentarily fix their ever-shifting faith. But, to do him justice, Mr. McKenna did place in some perspective the general strength of the British Navy, for though he finally narrowed his calculations to the single "Dreadnought" test, he admitted that behind this type would lie, in the early months of 1912, fifty modern British battleships. As against these ships, backed by an overwhelming force of heavily-armoured cruisers, Germany could not produce a single ship able to meet one of the eight most powerful vessels which it would contain, or probably many other British ships. Therefore, if the German and British "Dreadnoughts" destroyed each other, leaving three or five British ships over, Germany would be as powerless against our Navy as she is to-day. But these were not the calculations that scared the country and drove the party of economy from their guns. It was the Prime Minister who produced this sensational result by declaring that Germany had not only caught us up in the power to build "Dreadnoughts" with rapidity, but that the Government had last year found her out in the act of laying down, or preparing to lay down, the four ships which under her programme should only have been commenced in 1909. Mr. Asquith described this as a "most grave" discovery, involving a complete "falsification" of the Government's view of the character of the German programme. So indeed the House of Commons received it. They believed that Germany had deliberately stolen a march upon us, and had broken at least the spirit, if not also the letter, of her revised programme. Whatever Mr. Asquith meant the House to think, they scented a hostile and a secret act, designed to shake, or even break down, our naval supremacy.

But that was not all. The question at once shaped itself in men's minds: "What is the measure of the peril to which this surreptitious proceeding has exposed the British nation?" Now, we cannot think that the Prime Minister stated this vital point with due balance or propriety. When Mr. Asquith, in the first part of his speech, dealt, incidentally, with his own statement of the two-Power standard, he qualified it with the remark that he reckoned in our force the whole defensive strength of the Navy. But when he dealt with Anglo-German rivalry, he destroyed the whole basis of his first argument and narrowed the contention to the competition in "Dreadnoughts" until he had brought the House to the conclusion that, in the early months of 1912, we should be standing on a mere razor's edge of security, based on only twenty English "Dreadnoughts" to Germany's seventeen. We note, in passing, that the Prime Minister omitted the two "Nelsons," which the "Navy League" includes in the "Dreadnought" class, and which some experts regard as superior to the later ship, not only in variety of armaments, but in fighting power. But how was this figure attained? Only by supposing, as Mr. McKenna supposed, that, in addition to the German acceleration, "discovered" in November, a further acceleration takes place in the programme of 1910-11. But Mr. Asquith admitted that Germany, we presume through the German Ambassador in London, has offered us a "most distinct declaration" that no such acceleration should take place—i.e., that only four ships would be laid down this year. And on the top of this declaration we have the repeated assurance of Admiral von Tirpitz, in the Reichstag, that only thirteen German ships could be at sea, not in the spring, but in the autumn, of 1912. At a later stage in the debate, Mr. Lee had the assurance to tell the House of Commons that the German declaration was "not worth the paper it was written on." But if Mr. Lee's language denies the validity of a solemn pledge, Mr. Asquith's calculation ignores it. Do we assume that Germany is lying in the face of Europe and the world, and in such a way that she can speedily be brought to disgrace by proof of her falsehood? If we do assume it, what is the end we suppose her to have in view? The invasion of England on a basis of seventeen "Dreadnoughts" to our sixteen plus two "Nelsons"? If we do not assume it, and if she is acting with average self-respect and honor, Admiral von Tirpitz's and Count Metternich's assurances should finally relieve our doubt as to British naval predominance in this special class of battleship, as well as in every other. And if the contrary hypothesis finds general favor in this country, the moral and the end of such declarations as were made by Mr. Balfour, and in a minor degree by Mr. Asquith, are not the spending of more millions on "Dreadnoughts," with a view to a doubtful trial of strength two or three years hence, but War now—at a moment when British supremacy stands unquestioned even by the Navy League.

It is in this regard that we strongly deprecate a tone and a line of argument which take the most unfavorable ground of comparison in the material strength of the two Navies, and practically ignore the whole moral basis of statesmanship. In ignoring it, we bind ourselves to a set of material calculations which in fact are strung on a gossamer thread. Here were the two Front Benches figuring out a series of fancy estimates as to how many ships of a special type Germany will have at various arbitrary dates in years to come, when in fact the entire speculation is in the air, for Germany has not built one such ship, and cannot now complete the two opening vessels of the class within three years of ordering them. How can good-will subsist in an atmosphere black with these goblin fears and jealousies? And if tried and experienced judgments darken the air with unnerving visions of perils to come, and hint that a Navy three times as strong as Germany's in material and more than twice as strong in personnel may three years hence—by some devilish alchemy—be mastered and destroyed by its now feeble rival—which must in the meantime train about 60,000 new sailors and build, try, and manœuvre a vast fleet of giants not one of which she has yet put under steam—we may be sure that the undisciplined minds of popular journalists and gossips will go still further astray. The whole occasion of these alarms may be utterly frivolous. All the while there may be nothing in Germany's action which is either secret or abnormal—nothing but a business-like proceeding which our Admiralty, with its wits about it, might long ago have imitated. Is the theory underlying all these perturbations that Germany means to attack us on a basis of a superiority or an inferiority of one or more "Dreadnoughts" at some month in 1911 or 1912? Have we made any serious or formal tender of a naval understanding, and while we complain, with some reason, of the recent growth of her Navy, do we not provide the reasonable excuses which she invariably tenders when she points to the arrangements we yearly make for the destruction of her rapidly growing commerce? On the other hand, is there a tittle of proof, even in the new programme, that it is naval predominance, rather than increased diplomatic strength, which she seeks? Even the "Times" correspondent in Berlin speaks of her practice of collecting material in advance of laying down ships as "notorious" and part of her "system." Is not the whole apparatus and method of her programme open to our censure and to that of the world? Are "Dreadnoughts" needles, that they can be hid in haystacks? And has Liberal statesmanship no other duty than to multiply such alarms? At this moment Germany, America, and Russia acknowledge a joint deficit of 65 millions in their annual accounts. We are racing along the same path, throwing away social reform as we go, and turning our backs on reason and moral force.

THE IMPOTENCE OF EUROPE.

War is, in itself, such sheer unreason that to the last the sober onlooker is tempted to consider this Austro-Servian situation nothing worse than a trial of diplomatic wits. We have seen a Turco-Bulgarian and an Austro-Turkish difficulty quietly settled during the present winter, though both of them threatened more than once to lead to war. Servia, by provoking war, could only hope to sell her life dearly; Austria would have nothing to gain save the affirmation of a superiority which she can always impose by the dry terrorism of a tariff. To whom then could a war be profitable? There is a war party in Russia, and responsible persons in St. Petersburg, both official and unofficial, have done much to encourage the hopes of the Serbs. But there are three factors which would make Russian participation in a Balkan war an act of almost suicidal madness—first, the patent unpreparedness of her army which her War Minister, General Roediger, has advertised with almost unnecessary frankness in the Duma, then the evident inclination of Germany to support Austria in the field, if Russia should interfere, and, lastly, the no less obvious reluctance of France to back her ally in any policy of adventure, either with money or with arms. On the plane, then, of reason and calculation, it would seem that war is a folly which none of the States involved could have any motive in perpetrating. The present alarms will make the fortune of contractors and financiers, enhance the reputation of one or two statesmen, and give to Panslavists in Russia, to patriots in Servia, and to Imperialists in Austria, the excitement which their temperaments crave, but in the end—if such calculations count for anything—some formula will be discovered, some make-believe enacted which will once more sanctify things as they are, and register the plain facts that Austria is a Great Power, Russia an amorphous anarchy, Europe a fiction, and Servia the weakest of Balkan States.

Such calculations may be fairly applied to nine diplomatic situations out of ten, but history unfortunately shows that the tenth or irrational instance is not infrequent. One might have argued quite as plausibly that Mr. Kruger could not possibly challenge a conflict with the British Empire, or Greece defy Turkey. It is when a country appears to have no tolerable future if it keeps the peace, that it adventures everything upon the hazard of war. The conservative force in most countries is a ruling or official class, which will always enjoy the compensations of place and salary, however low the national prestige may fall. The placeman rarely despairs of the Republic, and commonly takes an optimistic view of any humiliation which leaves his own fortunes intact. But the peculiarity of Servia is that she probably is the most democratic country in Europe. King Peter dare not risk unpopular moderation; he has to remember that the only Servian prince who died in his bed had made that bed in exile. Parties are well organised, and are provided with a superfluity of competing chiefs. The Skupshtina exercises, in secret sessions if necessary, a vigilant control over foreign policy which other parliaments might envy. The newspapers are numerous, noisy, and short-lived. Nowhere is there a reputation which could survive a single shattering blow. To us, with our Hanoverian dynasty, our paucity of recognised party leaders, and our House of Lords, such a condition of flux and instability is difficult to conceive. But the plain fact is that if popular opinion in Servia meant to have war there is no native force which could restrain it. In gauging that popular opinion, it is necessary to remember not merely that its resentment against Austria is just, and its commiseration for the Bosnians genuine and well-founded, but also that it has behind it no traditions of stable peace. The grandfathers of the modern Servians were the swineherds and the brigands who won their freedom in guerilla wars against the Turks; their fathers and their elders took part in three wars in a single decade. In Montenegro, and even in the southern mountains of Servia, the attitude towards fighting and courage is quite as primitive as that of Afghans or Pathans. In dealing with such a race, it would be foolish to rely too much on calculation.

European opinion has done full justice to the adroitness and correctitude of Servia's attitude. She makes on Austria no claim whatever, but leaves her whole case to the "tribunal" of Europe. To the Austrian suggestion of commercial negotiations, she drily replies that just a year ago she completed with Austria the negotiation of a commercial treaty which that Power has omitted to ratify. There is, in short, no dispute, no need for negotiation, and no interruption of neighborly relations. So far M. Milovanovitch has framed a reply which is masterly in its irritating propriety. No little Power has any business to be so manifestly in the right. But there is, we are afraid, a fatal flaw in this Servian propriety. She appeals to the Powers, yet she accumulates armaments. She places her case before a "tribunal," yet she calls out her reserves. She declares that her relations with Austria are normal and neighborly, yet she masses her forces on the Drina. She might defend that action by expressing incredulity as to the reality of the Europe to which she appeals. There is no "tribunal." There is no force of public opinion strong enough to protect her from bullying, if she were to disarm. No one can be certain that a Conference will ever meet, and if meet it does, it will only be a court to register accomplished facts. The Servian attitude is nothing more than a clever display of wit—one might almost say of irony. Servia puts herself in the right, by demonstrating that Europe is very much in the wrong.

There are two possible developments for such a situation as this. There is, firstly, the old-fashioned heroic method of 1848. The Serb race lies to-day dismembered and oppressed under Austrian despotism, as the Italian race did then. Servia has an army and a dynasty as Sardinia had then. Given courage and opportunity, would a war to-day be more culpable than it was then? The parallel, however, is imperfect. The Bosnians have not first risen as the Milanese did; Austria is not herself in the throes of a domestic revolution; the atmosphere of Europe no longer breathes the unrest of a stormy spring, and, above all, King Peter's army is not to be compared with King Albert's. The method of 1848 was gallant, great-hearted, but primitive. Yet the sixty years which separate us from that adventure have apparently brought Europe no nearer to the possibility of a collective action which may take the place of war. The Servians are abused in the German Press as "semi-civilised." But what shall we say of this European civilisation, which cannot produce a "tribunal" to try such a case, or of the elaborate culture of the German Powers which think it a degradation to answer the summons of a weak litigant to appear at such a bar? If the Servian appeal to Europe is allowed to result in war, it will be because the feuds of triple entente and triple alliance have destroyed the very ideal of a European Concert. We do not know what course the disinterested Powers are likely to adopt. But if they were inspired by a determination to assert the reality of international right, they certainly would not sit inactive. Servia has been solemnly lectured and advised to leave her case in the hands of Europe. The corollary of that action would be a similar admonition to Austria. It would be proper to warn Servia that she must disarm, but it would be impossible to give that advice without adding to it some collective guarantee against aggression, and some pledge that moderate and just demands shall be satisfied. That the disinterested Powers have the spirit or the statesmanship to adopt so high a line as this, we doubt. Servia will be publicly scolded, Austria privately advised. Efforts will be made to keep the peace, but that peace will not be prepared by justice. If the Servians choose to be humble, they can, no doubt, obtain a railway or some similar material dole. But from start to finish the one element of the situation which will not be considered is the wishes of the Bosnians themselves. Plébiscites died with Palmerston. Some sort of Conference will meet, no doubt, but merely to sanction Austria's breach of public law and to proclaim the complicity and the impotence of Europe. If war results the divisions of Europe will stand gaping and confessed. If it is averted, the conclusion will be only that Europe is unanimous to smother a wrong and compound an international felony.

THE NEW AMERICAN TARIFF.

The revision of the American tariff "by its friends" after many years of promise is at length to be fulfilled. The Bill submitted this week to Congress by Mr. Payne bears on its face the impress of various reform forces, and the changes it proposes are of a somewhat more radical character than had been anticipated. Apart from the indiscriminate attack upon the Dingley Tariff maintained by the Democratic Party, three lines of criticism have received considerable support among non-party men, and even in Republican quarters manufacturers everywhere demanded free access to the raw materials their trades required, while popular feeling became increasingly insistent upon the withdrawal of tariff aid from the great trusts and upon increased taxation of the expenditure of the rich. With certain noteworthy exceptions these are the lines followed in the Payne Tariff Bill. The most important reform is the placing of a number of raw materials on the free list, including bituminous coal, hides, flax, iron ore, and wood-pulp for paper-making, and a large reduction in the duty upon lumber. These measures, if they are maintained, will greatly strengthen the commerce with Canada, and may probably evoke further modifications of the Canadian tariff favorable to American imports and involving further withdrawals of the British preference. Works of art are also put upon the free list, but live native talent is to be protected by the proviso that such works of art must be at least twenty years old.

Reductions of duties upon raw materials of course involve reductions upon the manufactured goods into which they enter as costs. While the Bill was before the Committee of Ways and Means, the fiercest struggle was waged by manufacturers to prevent reductions in their manufactures corresponding to the gains they got for free materials. Indeed, the science of tariff-making from the trade standpoint consists precisely in the pressure a trade can bring upon the legislature, enabling it to give less than it gets. Washington, during the preparation of this Bill, has been thronged with trade-bosses "seeing" committee-men and organising "evidence" to show that their particular lines of goods would not bear reduction, or securing compensation in some lines for reduction upon others. Indeed, the Tariff Bill, as it stands, is a pretty plain index of the sort of "science" that goes with Protection. Take, for example, the most important branches of the textile trades. The tariff on woollens, amounting, on an average, to ninety-one per cent., long recognised as an impudent monstrosity, is actually retained intact, while slight cuts in certain manufactured cottons are compensated by rises in rates of other cottonware. On the other hand, important reductions are effected in the iron and steel schedules, due, doubtless, chiefly to the notoriety given by Mr. Carnegie and others to the palpable absurdity of protecting an industry which enjoys the cheapest materials and the most economical methods of manufacture in the world.

While the Committee was sitting Mr. Taft commented with asperity upon the fact that no witnesses were summoned representing the interests of the consumer. In American legislation organised interests alone ccunt, and the consumer cannot organise. A striking illustration of this truth is furnished by the increase of duties in the case of most imports which pass straight into consumption without forming materials for any American manufacture. Not merely foreign luxuries are required to pay higher rates, but fresh duties are put upon the breakfast table of the people, tea and cocoa being taken out of the free list, and coffee being subjected to an increased tax. Except in regard to certain agricultural and mining trades, the new tariff shows no real abatement of the stringency of the protective policy, and when it has passed through the ordeal of the Senate, where the naked force of organised trade interests works more effectively than in the House, such liberality as it possesses may be found to have been extracted. This, at least, is the lesson taught by past revisions. The ordinary American citizen, though not a free-trader, is distrustful of tariff-mongers; he knows that tariffs foster trusts and combines, raise the prices of clothes and other necessaries, and are instruments of widespread political corruption in such States as Pennsylvania. He has always been favorable, therefore, to reduction of tariffs, his party politicians have always promised reductions, but somehow, when the Tariff Law has been enacted, it is found that the high protectionists have held their ground. We shall be agreeably surprised if this is not the issue of the Payne Tariff Bill. One important change in the structure of the tariff deserves attention, the adoption of the maximum and minimum scales, whereby the United States will be enabled to retaliate against countries which discriminate against her, or refuse her most favored nation treatment, by simply adding twenty per cent. to the ordinary duty. This provision will, we understand, dispense with the special trade agreements with Germany, France, and other countries, leaving it to the executive to determine in what cases the higher level of tariff is applicable.

So far as our trade with the United States is concerned, it appears likely to benefit but little by the proposed reductions, even should they hold. For the duties upon the textiles, earthenware, leather, and other goods which we can produce cheaper or better than America, are in nearly all cases maintained, while the reductions upon metals do not appear to apply to the machinery which figures largely in our export trade. It is, however, some satisfaction to be assured that special treaties with other foreign nations shall not in fact preclude us from the full benefit which Free Trade ensures us of sending in our goods at the minimum rate. The growing habit of protective nations to construct their tariffs on the two-level basis has important reactions upon the practicability of particular retaliation, which we commend to the attention of Mr. Winston Churchill. Certain of our trades are always likely to be hit severely, and, as it will appear, "unfairly," by a new foreign tariff. Once permit our Government to employ the weapon of particular retaliation which will be urged upon her by the injured interest, what will be the result? Not a "particular" retaliation in return, still less a concession, but simply the automatic withdrawal of the minimum tariff and a punishment of all our export trade to the tune of twenty per cent. increased duties. The rigid minimum tariff is an admission on the part of protective countries of the inherent inconsistency between protection and particular negotiation by concessions: the maximum tariff is the substitution of a general for a particular retaliation. Such is the nature of the modern "scientific" tariff. If we are fatuous enough to abandon Free Trade, we, too, can practise this retaliation, but, so long as we retain Free Trade, particular retaliation remains impracticable, involving a double cost; first, the injury to our consumers by the enhanced price of the goods subjected to the retaliatory duty; secondly, the loss of the minimum tariff, which will follow, as a matter of course, from our act of retaliation.

THE LOGIC OF WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE.

The leaders of the Suffragist agitation have made much of the simple and logical character of their demand for suffrage on the same terms as men. Logic has been represented as the corner-stone of their position, and much has been said, and not unjustly, in our view, of the inconsistency of those Liberals who are convinced Democrats so far as men are concerned, but refuse to admit the precisely similar considerations which make for the extension of the vote to the unenfranchised sex. But what are we to say of the logic of Mrs. Fawcett and the Women's Social and Political Union in opposing Mr. Geoffrey Howard's Bill? Mr. Howard has introduced a Bill for the enfranchisement of all adult men and all adult women on precisely the same terms of a simple residential qualification. One might suppose that this would satisfy the most ardent woman suffragist. On the contrary, in the name of the enfranchisement of women, Mr. Howard is attacked for enfranchising too many women. The criticisms of the Social and Political Union may perhaps be excused on the score of political youthfulness. They are at the stage when it seems a mark of weighty wisdom to detect deceit and subterfuge in every movement of every other political group. With penetrating eye Miss Pankhurst has seen to the bottom of Mr. Howard's dark design. She unmasks the traitor who is killing the cause of womanhood with too much kindness, who is playing with the political affections of her party. and under the guise of an excessive generosity is insidi-ously putting forward a measure which he does not intend to become law. Mr. Howard's offence is that he proposes a democratic measure in place of the limited Bill. If the suffragist leaders could bring their eyes to bear for a moment on the facts which lie plainly before them, instead of straining them to discover the non-existent, they would be aware by this time of the fact that a limited Bill will not be accepted by the present House of Commons, and that the trifler accordingly would be he who should again introduce a Bill on those lines. Mr. Howard's Bill, or a measure conceived on the principles of Mr. Dickinson's second Bill, on the other hand, might well be adopted by the Government, in accordance with Mr. Asquith's conditional pledge, and it would then, whether accepted by the House of Lords or not, become a substantive part of the Liberal programme. If there is any case for the imputation of insincerity here, it lies against those who maintain that in the present House of Commons the way to the suffrage lies through a limited Bill.

The case of Mrs. Fawcett, however, is far worse than that of Miss Pankhurst. Mrs. Fawcett has been in politics for many years, and cannot plead inexperience. She purports to condemn the Bill in the name of all the Suffrage societies, but, in point of fact, we have seen no official pronouncement on the subject by her own National Union, and we should be interested to know whether that Union is, in point of fact, prepared to stultify itself along with its president. The very same papers which published her letter gave one on the other side signed by many of the best-known names in the world of women's work. But what concerns us more for the moment is Mrs. Fawcett's logic. There is, she says, no demand for adult suffrage now, because any man, however poor, can get a vote if he wants one. When she wrote this she must have temporarily forgotten some very familiar facts. What is still more remarkable is that there is, in her view, a real demand for the vote for "duly qualified" women; that is to say, for the million, or, perhaps, two million, who happen to possess the qualifications prescribed by the existing law for men, but no demand on behalf of the remainder, who constitute a large majority of all women. In the very moment of objecting to the enfranchisement of this majority Mrs. Fawcett recommends her own scheme on the ground that it will relieve "half the population" from the ban of perpetual exclusion, although, on her own showing, three-fourths, or five-sixths, of this half will not have the vote.

Mrs. Fawcett compares Mr. Howard's Bill to that of a supposed attempt in old days to remove Jewish disabilities by a general measure of enfranchisement. We should have said that, if anyone acting in the interests of religious liberty had, in those days, proposed to relieve Jews and, say, Roman Catholics in the same Bill, the Jews would have been very unwise and very narrow-minded if they had refused their support, and the more clever among them would, we feel sure, have recognised one thing. They would have seen that, if they opposed such a Bill, their opposition would be ascribed to a prejudice against Catholicism so deep as to overcome their own desire for justice. Similarly, those who are against Mr. Howard must reckon with the fact that their opposition betrays a dislike of democracy at least as strong as their devotion to the suffrage for their own sex. Yet, what at bottom is the argument for women's suffrage that is slowly conquering prejudice, and which stands firm against all the ridicule that the ill-conceived action of the militants has provoked? What remains unshaken when we have fairly faced the fact that the hopes of gentler influences and milder counsels to come from the advent of women in public life are to be reckoned among the vanished illusions of pre-democratic experience? What remains, except the old and simple democratic principle that has vindicated itself in South Africa and the East, and for the coming of which the subjects of autocracy still cry, as for the only deliverer which political thought can yet devise for them—the principle that the rights and duties of citizenship apply to every normally developed member of the community? Against this principle one barrier after another could be, and has been, erected. In old days it was urged that the working class were unfit for the suffrage, and the reply was that even if they had less leisure and capacity for political affairs, this was, at most, a difference of degree which did not touch the question of principle involved in the rights of citizenship. So, in these days, if it is urged that women differ from men in capacity or sanity of judgment or what not, the answer is that, if admitted at all, the difference is one of degree, which does not touch the rudimental issue of right. To touch that issue the opponent must prove a difference of kind in the qualities affecting the judgment of affairs and the sense of civic responsibility. But the average man does not stand so high in these respects that his wife or his sister need greatly fear the comparison. Those who call themselves convinced democrats, and fairly face the essential identity of the present controversy with that which their fathers waged for the enfranchisement of the working class, and that which they themselves are waging on behalf of Indians and others, cannot refuse the logical conclusion. But the argument holds in the converse with equal force. The principle at the back of woman's suffrage is the principle of democracy. Every prejudice, every argument from tradition, every appeal to the well-established fact and the danger of innovation, is against it. It rests simply and solely on the grounds of justice, and the universal validity of elementary civic rights. But these are arguments not for a limited, but for a universal suffrage. To plead for woman's suffrage on democratic grounds and to oppose Mr. Howard's Bill as too democratic, betrays radical incoherence of thought. We are for Mr. Howard's Bill for the same reason which makes us supporters of woman's suffrage in principle, and opponents of the limited Bills which the suffrage societies so strangely prefer. We support it, that is to say, because it is a simple and consistent democratic measure, and as such, in view of Mr. Asquith's pledges, we trust it may obtain, not merely the support of a majority in the House of Commons, but the patronage of the Government itself.

Life and Letters.

THE GOOD AND THE BEAUTIFUL.

"THERE is no political alchemy by which you can get golden conduct from leaden instincts," wrote Herbert Spencer. But the age of miracles in which we live is restoring credibility to the doctrine of transmutation of metals, and the spiritual alchemy which Spencer disclaimed is adopted by modern evolutionists as a natural process in the ascent of man. As soon as Darwin had established man's animal origin, the old conceptions of the spiritual, moral, and reasonable nature of man were destined to disappear before the demands of the law of continuity. The separate and unique place claimed for man in the organic world could no longer be maintained; all his noblest and most complex qualities of personality, soul, reason, and imagination, must find their roots in lower forms of organism. The popular revulsion against this inevitable truth found characteristic expression in Disraeli's ejaculation, "I am on the side of the angels." No phrase better enables us to realise the change of mind which Darwinism has silently wrought in a generation. We are risen animals, not fallen angels, and it is in this labored ascent from lowly origins that we are coming more and more to realise not only the science, but the romance of human history. No pursuit can be more alluring or more important than the tracing of the most refined processes of human conduct in religion, law, morality, the fine arts, to the persistent pressure of some primal organic forces of adjustment. But we would add that few pursuits are more baffling. For though the inner history of man has stamped its impress on innumerable outer shapes, these inscriptions are only made clearly legible by a sympathetic re-creation of the spirit of primitive man in all its mysterious units.

Two interesting treatises which lie before us serve to illustrate at once the fascination and the perplexity of this search for psychical origins. One by Mr. McDougall, entitled "Social Psychology" (Methuen & Co.), seeks for the roots of social feeling and conduct in the raw instincts and emotions of animals. "The instinctive impulses determine the ends of all activities, and supply the driving power by which all mental activities are maintained; and all the complex intellectual apparatus of the most highly developed mind is but a means towards these ends, is but the instrument by which these impulses seek their satisfactions, while pleasure and pain do but serve to guide them in their choice of the means. These impulses are the mental forces that maintain and shape all the life of individuals and societies, and in them we are confronted with the central mystery of life and mind and will." The task to which Mr. McDougall addresses himself is to distinguish the simple instincts which are exhibited in lower organisms and in primitive man, and to show how their slowly evolving composition, modification, and organisation produce the complex character and conduct of a modern civilised man, capable of self-control and of employing his will in realising an ideal self in an ideal society. The animal man, like other animals, he sees fitted out with an apparatus of instinctive actions, flight, curiosity, pugnacity, self-display, and the like, each with its appropriate emotions, fear, wonder, anger, elation, each serving some definitely biological service for survival or progress. In the course of human history, these emotions, with other primitive tendencies, became blended and complicated, giving rise to the more elaborated sentiments of shame, pity, surprise, sorrow, in which our more fully conscious self is engaged, and in which a clearer sense of relations towards other selves finds emotional expression. As the "self" thus gets a richer emotional content, it becomes more closely knit and more finely intellectualised. Moral judgments of approval and disapproval, implying standards of social conduct and responsibility, emerge, and the will seeks to achieve clearly conceived and firmly desired ends of conduct. Since this morality rests upon the two pillars of self and society, it is evident that primary importance attaches to certain primitive feelings of anger and self-display on the one hand, parental tenderness and gregariousness upon the other, which are the special feeders of the later concepts and emotions of egoism and social sympathy.

The other volume before us, Mr. Felix Clay's "The Origin of the Sense of Beauty" (Smith, Elder), pursues a somewhat similar enquiry further back into the order of Nature, tracing our pleasure in the beautiful as exhibited by the fine arts to definite utilities. "It is this curious contradiction between the obvious connection joining beauty and utility, on the one hand, and the almost passionate denial of the artist and lover of beauty that utility has anything to do with it, on the other, that creates a great stumbling-block. The answer lies, as we hope to have shown, in the fact that all forms to have survived must have been at one time useful, and that our likings and tendencies must have been developed to like and appreciate things only because they were useful in the first place, but that the likings and tendencies remain long after the disappearance, owing to changes of environment, of the particular objects—at all events, as useful objects—upon which they were formed, and thus they come to form the tastes which seem so inexplicable, and in their later forms have, in a great majority of cases, no perceivable relation to the useful." The thesis is elaborated most ingeniously, with a richness of observation and of speculation that is very stimulating. Mr. Clay carries the conception of utility as the moulding influence a good deal further back than Mr. McDougall, for the ultimate "instinct" to which he drives is "an instinct for conformity with nature," illustrated not merely by means of human sensation and emotion, but in the very movements of inorganic matter seeking equilibrium or moving along a line of least resistance. "We do not like a thing because it is beautiful: it is beautiful because we like it." And we have been compelled to like it because "our likes and dislikes are the present forms of originally necessary reactions formed by physico-chemical reflexes which drew the organism towards the wholesome or suitable, or away from the dangerous or unsuitable."

That this new utilitarianism in art and morals contains a large element of truth there can be no question. That everything hostile to physical life tends to be eliminated in the "struggle," everything serviceable to survive, admits no doubt, and this physical utility always remains a real condition of the development of every character of the higher life. But how much does this explain? In reading these psychological treatises obstinate doubts arise. Both writers admit that in the course of evolution the raw, blind impulses of animal utility get transformed so as to serve ideal ends. But the modus operandi of the transformation is not explained. It is not even shown that the human species, in order physically to survive, must evolve the noblest refinements of moral character and conduct, nor how the fine arts ever came to throw off the trammels of utility while retaining the pleasurable appeals. May there not be some defects in the presentation of this drive of primitive impulses in the individual? The dominance of biological conceptions over evolution implies that every action of an organism must contribute to survival of the individual or the species. But surely man exists not only for himself and for his species, but for the universe, and this not in a vaguely ideal sense, but in the sense that there must be found among his instincts, impulses, and emotions, some that are related not particularly to himself or to society, but to wider nature. If this is so, the fact must be taken into account in explanations of morality or of our sense of beauty. The individual will, and the social will, are not everything. There is the cosmic will, or its equivalent, to reckon with when human history is to be understood. Not everything we like is beautiful, not every sort of fit action commands moral approval. If utility is to be recognised as the determinant factor in human evolution towards an ever higher morality and even finer arts, it must be released from its bondage to biology, unless, indeed, biology can itself be enlarged into a complete science and art of life. The conception of ideals as operative forces in human life has not yet been accommodated to the teaching of biology, since the older doctrines of preformism and exfoliation have been abandoned. The groping of low-conscious animals after some better adjustment to immediate environment seems merely to imply the operation of some crude vitality, driven by present pressure, in which no specific purpose, no ideal, is represented. Those who seek an explanation for morals and the fine arts in these primitive organic impulses and their claim that somehow their higher combinations are directed to the conscious realisation of ideals, seem to commit an illicit volte face. If ideals ever get into the human process as directing and determining influences, they must be there, however sub-conscious, from the beginning, and containing, as they must, in embryo, all the higher "utilities" of humanity, they must always interfere with the simpler adjustments to immediate environment to which utilitarian biologists confine their attention. In other words, if a whole set of wider, deeper purposes, organic, social, cosmic, are really represented in the "urge" of human life from its beginning, we cannot get an adequate comprehension of the finer arts of life by seeking all their origins in those instincts and tendencies which are directed to immediate purposes of physical survival for the organism and its species. This criticism does not, of course, involve the rejection of "utility" as test, guide, and instrument of human progress. But it requires us to give the useful a meaning which is not liable to harmful restriction and misunderstanding from the narrower uses in which it has been employed in the past.

THE "ILIAD" AS A WHOLE.

Not long ago the present writer finished reading through the "Iliad"—rapidly, but carefully and continuously, from the first line to the last. Every year a few scores of young Englishmen, aged about twenty, perform this feat at Oxford or Cambridge, as he did once upon a time. And every year, perhaps, some of them re-read a few favorite books of the poem; as he, too, has always done. But how many modern English adults have ever read the "Iliad" as a whole?

The question is worth asking, for these reasons. The scholar, whose duty it quite properly is to be meticulous, to dwell not merely on individual books but on individual cruces, to keep his brightest eye open for forms and constructions, to cram his best memorising and co-ordinating faculties with the parallel passages which elucidate the meaning of Homeric words, or sound inferences as to Homeric facts—this man can seldom see the wood for the trees, and even his interest in the trees is a botanist's, and not an artist's. Doubtless he takes some artistic pleasure in what he reads, but he scarcely reads for the sake of it; and—which is our main point here—he absorbs it almost all piecemeal, from the contemplation of little bits of the poem at a time. Moreover, in matters of scholarship he knows how necessary it is to be aware of, and to start from, the views of his predecessors. Modern scholarship rises like a building; you cannot often start afresh at the foundations, or even from the ground level; usually you must begin by climbing the scaffoldings that Buttmann, Lachmann, and their successors have erected, and lay your bricks high up by way of superstructure. The scholar tends to transfer this method from his scholarship to his artistic criticism; and there it fosters a cult of traditional make-believe. No doubt Taste as well as Knowledge comes partly by learning; but the one far more than the other depends on the perpetual alert intervention of our living selves; so that an apparatus which supplies the spectacles and microscopes for Knowledge, sometimes only fastens blinkers upon Taste.

Few modern scholars seem to bring their real taste, their own taste, freely to bear upon Greek authors, or tell us quite honestly what they mean for them. Even the brilliant men who do, find when they come to Homer a temptation to burn incense in so many other shrines—those of Folk-Lore, Anthropology, and the rest—that the poems get less studied than others on their artistic side. Against the verdicts which the scholars promulgate, the young men of twenty cannot stand up. Their guerilla dashes, if they made any, would be swept away by the volley-firing of the veterans; the latter have, too, the strategical advantage of being examiners pitted against examinees.

Now not many bits of modern scholasticism have more universal vogue than this: That the "Iliad" is a thing of shreds and patches. Folk-lore and philology between them have in these latter days moved mountains. The childlike romance that there was once a man called Homer, who wrote the "Iliad" and "Odyssey"—the "blind old man of Scio's rocky isle"—need not detain us. Any schoolboy who knows Greek almost blushes to mention such a fable; he would as soon attribute the Epistle to the Hebrews to St. Paul. But the theories which divide the schools to-day agree in dispelling far more than that. They dispel nearly all that matters, artistically, of the unity of each of the epics. The "Odyssey," indeed, perpetually recovers. Its more limited canvas and single thread of narrative make its main unity almost obtrusive. Yet the "Iliad," whose unity is far more complicated, triumphant, and artistic, just because its canvas is so much more crowded and its story has so many more threads, is proclaimed a mere patchwork, and studied only as such by nearly everybody. Even so conservative a critic as Jebb confines the "primitive Iliad" to portions of nine books (1, 11, and 16-22), or, at most, a third of the whole. The rest (including quite two-thirds of the finest work in the poem) is shreds and patches by numerous hands, and any large unity that it now exhibits must be rather editorial than creative.

About the evidence on behalf of the patchwork view, two observations may be hazarded here. In the first place, it has a peculiar intrinsic fascination. No brisk mind alighting on such an introduction to it as, say, the Homeric chapter in Professor Murray's "Greek Literature" could fail to be allured. All round you in what had seemed solid walls doors fly open as by magic, disclosing novel vistas. In the second place, the modern scholar has drifted into caring more for the number of his arguments than for their specific weight. Out of the treasuries of learning he literally snows them upon you; yet, if severally examined, how weak, constantly, is the logic of each—mere presumptions, suggestions, at best analogies, often only seductive guess-work. How many would be allowed any weight in a court of law? Multiply nothing a thousandfold, say the mathematicians, it remains nothing. Taking even the stronger presumptions, we may easily be tricked by them. The celebrated string of arguments by which Macaulay thought he had proved that Sir Philip Francis wrote the letters of Junius is immensely stronger than almost any developed in Homeric criticism. And yet we know now, almost certainly, that Francis did not write the letters.

It may be answered that scholars use the best arguments of which the matter allows, and cannot be blamed if there are no better. The rejoinder is that they claim more certainty than such arguments warrant, and that they belittle the one fact which after all we can touch and see with least doubt—namely, the artistic unity of the poem. Of course, the "Iliad" as we have it contains manifest later additions. The clumsiest is the Catalogue in the second book; the author's catalogue, devised with characteristic art, is the scene in which Priam, Helen, and Antenor survey the Achaian warriors from Troy's battlements. But, deducting such pretty obvious excrescences, the "Iliad" is an astonishing whole. Read it as a whole, and you will be amazed at your ever having listened to such a view as that the "prowesses" of the different heroes were wedged in extraneously to incorporate earlier lays or flatter particular vanities or cults. Nothing, surely, could be more obviously, nor in the main, more admirably, designed and proportioned than the contributions which these several episodes make to the scheme of the entire poem. Nothing, again, is more remarkable than the consistency with which the characters are drawn, and the economy and forethought with which their drawing is planned. Achilles, Agamemnon, Odysseus, Nestor, Aias, and some other Achaian chiefs, Priam, Hector, Paris, Helen, Andromache—how richly distinct they are, what a number of them come before us completely drawn, and yet how they are all perfectly fitted into the composition! The delicate treatment of Helen and the single unique testimony to her beauty; the masterly, minute, and extraordinarily naturalistic portrait of Hera; the companionable and sport-loving traits that set off the grim passion of Achilles; the points of generosity whereby the character of Menelaos throws into relief, without exactly discrediting, that of his brother Agamemnon; the subtle alternation of scenes that enlists our sympathy and interest for both sides—surely it is the architectonics of all this which is its most striking feature. We laugh cheaply nowadays at the earlier centuries which classed the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" with the "Aeneid" or "Paradise Lost." Yet at least this classification did justice to the impression which the Homeric poems give of their being not great patchworks, but great designs.

In the "Iliad" hardly any character is ever praised, blamed, or directly discussed. You are just told what was done or said or thought, and you make your own generalisations. This is, as Flaubert held, the highest art in character-drawing. But it is certainly the hardest. No doubt there are some small contradictions in the characters, as there are in the narrative. Of the latter the discrepancy in the first book as to the whereabouts of the gods is a good example; it suggests carelessness about trifles far more than real mental confusion or plurality of authorship. In the main there is little inconsistency in the drawing and wonderfully little repetition. Every stroke tells in its place, and is not repeated in another place.

The typical riddle is that of the last two books. There can be little question but that they very materially improve the character-drawing and composition of the whole; indeed, they are almost indispensable. Yet the argument for their separate authorship is strong. Are there no ways round it? Everyone thinks that the poem went through centuries of uncertain transmission—largely oral—before the canonical text was fixed. These centuries are commonly regarded as a period of welding and conflation, wherein the "Iliad" was patched together from its constituent shreds. Does not such a view both under-estimate the unity of the poem which is to be accounted for, and over-estimate the power of editorship to simulate the effects of authorship? Surely a more plausible order is something like this: (1) a single great epic, composed by one poet in the last days of the Homeric, or Achaian, prehistoric, pre-migrational, pre-Hellenic civilisation; (2) a verbal transmission through the Dark Ages between the Homeric and the Hellenic zeniths, at different places and through different dialects; (3) a period of critical recensions, fixing the canon that we have. During (2) the poem would undergo many differing dialectical changes and verbal corruptions, resulting in different versions, which during (3) would be imperfectly and varyingly connected and harmonised. To the present writer now it is far easier to suppose that, for instance, the last two books owe their differences to a different recension than that they owe them to a different author. The theory does not affect obvious late additions like the dull Catalogue or the beautiful Shield of Achilles. But for the poem as a whole it reduces the second and third stages to quite subordinate facts, mainly of philological interest. The dominating fact becomes the single great poem, whose extraordinary boldness, richness, and unity of conception shines through all subsequent blurs and accidents, the earliest and still perhaps the most artistic fact in European literature.

THE MIND OF THE APES.

The third chimpanzee at the Zoo has just completed the third year of its captivity, the celebrated "Micky" being near the end of his eleventh and another well on in his fifth. "Consul the Great," the performing ape of the same species is now considered to be seven years old, and, like a human child of the same age, is cutting its second set of teeth. Lastly, a "Consul the Second" has appeared on the variety stage, where it pretends to be a man about as successfully as its earlier rival. The keeping of these great apes in health under captivity is now regarded as, in a measure, a psychical rather than a purely hygienic problem. The chimpanzee must not only be allowed a mixed diet and plenty of fresh air as well as a carefully guarded temperature, but he must be kept amused. The immortal "Sally" eschewed the society of her kind, and made enormous demands in this direction on the time of her keeper. She needed to be beguiled from the closing in of montony almost as assiduously as some old lady who must have a young and tactful companion ever at hand to chase away the bogey of solitude. It is possible that if some magistrate should refuse Consul's certificate to perform on the music-hall stage, he would shortly die of ennui, while it has been again and again demonstrated that these higher apes die of something like a broken heart if they lose a companion of their own kind.

As we watch the chimpanzees in their well-arranged house at the Zoo we can understand how large a part in their life is played by companionship. A tremendous zest is added to their meals by the attempt on the part of each to create a "corner" in the food that is supplied to the cage. After dinner, the process of digestion and the creation of a new appetite are encouraged by games between them much resembling those that our children engage in. As they play touch or follow-my-leader, or engage by the hour together in wrestling (catch as catch can) we see something very like a broad and happy smile break over the face of that one whose feint has given him an opening, or who has perceived in time the manœuvre planned by his opponent. Meanwhile the third chimpanzee who has elected not to play this afternoon, sits apart and tries to plait a piece of straw or puzzles himself like a young Newton with an investigation of the properties of concavity and convexity as illustrated by a pair of empty food dishes. You would think that here were three model pupils for the attention of a kindergarten mistress who could lift them to almost any heights of accomplishment.

In the next cage on the left live the orang outans, another member of the small class of the distinctly man-like apes. The orang does not strike the casual observer as quite so man-like as the chimpanzee. Anthropometrically he is more remote from, at any rate, the European standard. His legs are shorter, and his arms longer, than even the chimpanzee, whose proportions, so unlike our own, are nearer those of one or two of the human races most remote from ours in habits, custom, and thought. The orang outan, however, seems to have a larger brain than the other, a more dome-like forehead, a broader brow, and possibly a more thoughtful look. He is a cruel caricature of some lord chancellors or professors of abstruse science. It is, no doubt, his greater reserve and a morose insistence on his own way, as well as his greater rareness in captivity that have kept him from the notice of the impressario. Here, in his own house at the Zoo, one of the orang outans can be seen almost any day skilfully handling a fishing rod of his own contrivance. The rod and line are made of straw, bent in the middle, the chaffy ear is the bait, and, not being a fish-eater, he angles for water. He sits close against the front of his cage, and swings his little mop with unerring skill into a pan of water just across the corridor, drawing it back when wet, sucking the moisture off, and then making the swing again.

At the other end of the house are two gibbons, yet further removed from the god-like form we deem our bodies to be. In them, the arms run to a length like that of spiders' legs, attaining a reach, as the prize-fighter remarks enviously, that is truly surprising. They are the gamins of the anthropoid class, of which they are usually made to stand just beyond the verge. We strike the cage, however, in a quiet moment. The black gibbon is at the top of his rope, teasing out tow. Then he hangs with three feet on the rope, and with the free hand tosses the airy ball he has won and catches it again—a piece of sheer scientific amusement, an embroidery upon life such as we usually think only man is capable of. At last the catch fails, and the bit of tow falls, more rapidly than a feather, almost as quickly as a stick. It is a yard below the athlete when he drops after it. More quickly than the eye can follow he has hooked himself to the rope again, on a level with the descending ball, which he has deftly caught in the hand that had been tossing it. Then he returns to the top, moistens the tow, and rolls it up harder. This time it drops more swiftly, and the ape's eye telling him that he cannot catch it, he does not drop after it. He turns again to the frayed rope for the material of another experiment. He is puzzling out the law of gravity. Scoff not, gentle reader, for this gibbon almost certainly knows, as the average man in the street does not, that a lump of lead, for example, does not fall more quickly than a champagne cork. He can measure the velocity and the acceleration of falling bodies as effectively by comparison with his own agility as we can with an Attwood's machine.

But now the other gibbon is ready for a game of touch, and the cage becomes a scene of the wildest motion. The white-faced ape soon becomes "he," and our black friend flees. Dropping sheer from the top of the cage, he shoots out a long arm as though by chance, and touches the horizontal bar. To touch is to hold, and, a foot from the floor, the drop ceases, changes like lightning to an upward swing, that lands the black gibbon near the ceiling again. These flying leaps, apparently reckless, but really the calculation of truest experience, are the most fascinating thing to be seen at the Zoo. It is mere athleticism. But athleticism of this kind is surely a matter of brain, even if we must say brain on the physical side. It is like the certainty with which an accomplished cricketer times his ball and cuts it to an unprotected part of the field—and we do not expect our stupider folk to become good cricketers. If we would educate this monkey, it would be the greatest mistake to leave athleticism out of the curriculum. He would never have studied dynamics as we have seen him do if it had not been for his great agility in retrieving a falling body. May it not be, even in a wider sense, that he would never have become so agile if it had not been for his brain?

Brain makes physical prowess; physical prowess makes brain. It is an alternating, rhythmical process that goes on in the life of the individual and in the career of a race. In the monkeys, we have athletics in full swing, the agility that previous brain exercise has produced rather outweighing its source. In the gibbons, athletic exuberance is at its height, and the brain product is sprouting again. The great anthropoids have won to the security of dominance in the animal world. The gorilla is undisputed master of the African jungle; the orang outan fears not even the malayan crocodile; the chimpanzee, partly by individual strength, partly by greater social instincts, is, perhaps, more secure even than they. So they take up the deeper philosophical attainments of the sober, comparatively sedentary life. Each of them has advanced in architecture to the building of platforms to sit on and roofs to keep the rain off. They use sticks as weapons, throw stones, open refractory fruit with chosen instruments. Surely they would have gone further if there had not been one animal unreckoned with or given too long a start—man, who, breaking ruthlessly in upon their young civilisation, shoots them, captures them, makes their human aspirations a laughing-stock by teaching them to imitate his own tricks on the music-hall stage.

Present-Day Problems.

THE SLAVERY OF THE COCOA ISLANDS.

The decision of the three British firms of Cadbury, Rowntree, and Fry not to purchase any more San Thomé cocoa so long as the present conditions of supplying labor to the islands continue, recalls the great anti-slavery movement of a century ago. That movement ranks as one of the noblest deeds in our history. If the name of England should disappear from the roll of living nations, the peoples of the future will still remember our race for a few great qualities, a few great leaders of thought, and a few splendid purposes accomplished without consideration of loss or gain. Among those splendid purposes they will remember that at the beginning of the nineteenth century the English redeemed their slaves at a great price and declared that within the limits of their Empire no man or woman should be claimed as a slave or sold into slavery. The present action of the British cocoa firms shows us once more that our country has not lost that spirit of righteousness and freedom. It is still ready to maintain the simple principle that slavery is an abomination, even though the personal sacrifice in maintaining it may be large, as it was to our fathers.

There is no need to be pharisaical about the Portuguese slave-labor in Angola and the two cocoa islands far off the coast in the Gulf of Guinea. Other methods of labor are not above suspicion, even in India and our own Colonies. The detestable system is but a phase in the long contest between capital and the working people throughout the world. Nor are the Portuguese naturally more heartless than ourselves. They are not blind to the evil; both in Lisbon and Angola there is a party of reform, and I have heard out there of traders who have risked their lives, and lost them, too, in trying to bring the iniquity to light. There is no call for self-righteousness, and this is not a question of nationality. I only say that the system as I saw it in Angola and the islands four years ago, and as it is still carried on to-day, is slavery beyond dispute, and I believe it to be the most flagrant instance of slavery still existing in the world. Slavery is not a question of treatment, good or bad. It is a question of the sale of men and women at a price, and of their compulsory labor. There is much cruelty in the Angola slave-trade, and on the islands the death-rate was described by our Consul, Mr. Nightingale, as "enormous." But if there was no cruelty at all, and if the laborers on the plantations were as carefully tended as infants in a ducal nursery, the system would be slavery all the same. As Mr. Burtt, who was sent out by the cocoa firms to investigate, wrote in his report eighteen months ago:—

> "I am satisfied that under the serviçal system as it exists at present thousands of black men and women are, against their will, and often under circumstances of great cruelty, taken away every year from their homes and transported across the sea to work on unhealthy islands, from which they never return. If this is not slavery, I know of no word in the English language which correctly characterises it."

Mr. Burtt is speaking only of the islands, but the mainland of Angola is equally tainted with slavery, and all its plantations are worked by slaves. There is the further touch of irony that most of the plantations grow sugar-cane and sweet potato, entirely for the manufacture of spirits, which are one of the recognised forms of coinage in trading with the natives and work their utter destruction in health and character. I have known natives, in the neighborhood of a Portuguese store or settlement, who refused to work for cloth (i.e., cotton, which may be called the standard of value), or for salt (which is the small change of the interior), and demanded nothing but spirits in payment. The plantations on which the materials for spirits are grown, and where the spirits are usually manufactured, too, are, as I have said, entirely worked by slaves, and the slaves themselves with their children are included as part of the plantations when these are sold. Among officials and educated people you will hear the slaves spoken of as "serviçaes," or still more politely as "contracted laborers," but outside the polite classes they are called "slaves" without phrase, and a man's property is estimated by the number of slaves he possesses.

It is, however, with the islands that we have to do now; for very little, if any, cocoa is grown on the mainland, but the islands of San Thomé and Principe, standing in the hothouse atmosphere of the equator produce cocoa in plenty wherever the primeval forests are cleared and the cocoa trees planted. The plantations are very lucrative, and their increase has been rapid. In one year (1906 to 1907) the amount exported to England alone (between one-quarter and one-third of the total produce from the islands) increased by over three million pounds, and the islands now yield about one-fifth of the whole cocoa supply of the world. To keep pace with this increase, the supply of slaves has naturally increased also. From the average of about 1,000 slaves imported yearly between 1887 and 1896, the numbers rose to about 4,000 for the year when I was on the islands (summer, 1905), and since then they have further increased, the official figures that I have for last summer showing an average monthly import of 400 men and women slaves from the mainland, or nearly 5,000 a year. I am told that the price of the slaves is rising also with the demand. When I was there, a planter expected to give about £30 for a man or woman landed in good condition. The price, as I hear, has now gone up to £35 or even £40.

The traffic for supplying the slaves yields great profits to the dealers and their agents. Some of the men and women are captured in raids upon villages far in the interior, but nowadays most of them are bought cheap from chiefs or relations, in payment for witchcraft, or debts, or fines. Many are entrapped by trickery, many are sold by masters on the mainland who have found them useless or unmanageable. One large trader in Katumbella, near the coast, told me he could always get £12 to £16 a-piece for his slaves by taking them into Benguella (the chief port of embarkation) as soon as they were "fit for nothing but San Thomé." In the district of Bihé, however, which is some 300 or 400 miles inland, I found that a young slave was valued at one load of rubber or one ox, which may be put at about £9, and the further you go into the interior, the cheaper the slaves become, on account of the risk of loss in marching them down to the coast. The wretched men and women who have been torn from their homes are conducted in single file along the narrow paths that lead from the very centre of Africa over the main watershed between the Congo and Zambesi, down to the dry mountains of the coast. The journey takes weeks and months, and many die, especially in a scarcely inhabited length of country just east of the Quanza, where the sick who cannot keep up with the march are slaughtered for fear delay should exhaust the provisions of the gang. The path is scattered with the skeletons of slaves, and with the wooden shackles with which they are tied up at night, and sometimes by day.

On reaching a coast town, such as Benguella, Novo Rodondo, or Loanda, the slaves are kept in compounds till an ordinary passenger steamer calls. They are then taken before an official Curador, and asked if they are willing to labor in San Thomé for five years. No attention is paid to their answer. They are put on board, and after a week's journey are landed on the islands, and distributed among the plantations, according to demands previously made by the planters. Certain regulations are laid down about their labor, wages, and health. It is greatly to the interest of the planters to keep them alive, quite apart from any thought of humanity. Yet they die in large numbers, especially in their first year, chiefly of misery and home-sickness. A few escape to the forests. Sometimes they try for the mainland (about 180 miles away) in canoes. But up to this year none had ever gone home. This year, I am told, a few have been repatriated, perhaps owing to the indignation on the subject in England and various parts of Europe, besides Lisbon. But in most cases there can be very little mercy in dumping natives on the Angola coast, probably many hundred miles from the homes whence they were taken by fraud or violence or in payment of debts five years before. I do not wonder that of the 793 entitled to repatriation this year (being all that survived of about 4,000 imported five years ago) less than a tenth part have been "repatriated," and the great majority have preferred to "renew their contracts," retaining such security of existence as slaves enjoy.

Such is, in briefest statement, the system as it is now being carried on. Last week Mr. William Cadbury returned from a five months' visit to Angola and the islands, in company with Mr. Burtt, who had started on his first journey before I returned from mine, and whom I met on the islands in 1905. Mr. Cadbury deserves great credit for his determination to discover, not so much the truth about the system, for that was known, but the reality of the reforms promised by the Portuguese Government. He reports that "no adequate steps have yet been taken to remedy the evils proved to exist," and on the strength of that report the three British firms have declared their boycott against the cocoa. They state that they will reconsider their decision when they are satisfied that the "indentured laborers" have real freedom in entering into their contract, and full opportunity of returning to their homes at the end of it. Those are the points to insist upon. The new regulations issued by the Portuguese Government last January lay down some improvements about hospitals, labor, and the fraction of wages to be set aside for repatriation. But rules of that kind do not touch the root of the evil. The root of the evil is, as I said, the slavery involved in the system—the traffic in men and women, the forcible removal of them from their homes, the compulsory toil, the unlimited authority over their souls and bodies possessed by the planters who buy them. By shortening the term of contract to one, or at most two years, by paying fair and definite wages, and by returning the laborers to their homes without question, I believe it would be quite possible to cultivate the islands at a profit, even though the gains might not be so enormous as at present. But profit or not, the abomination of the present slave system cannot be allowed to continue, and I congratulate the firms (including the Co-operative Wholesale Society, the Stollwerck Company of Cologne, and the Suchard Company of Switzerland) on having taken the step which has always seemed to me the most effectual means of ending it.

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

The Drama.

"ONE LAW FOR MAN—"

OF modern French dramatists, M. Paul Hervieu is not the one who most appeals to me. His plays remind me too much of the propositions of Euclid, an author whom I esteem, but cannot love. It must be admitted, however, that M. Hervieu has all the good qualities of his Alexandrian exemplar. Having enunciated his theorem he sets resolutely about the task of demonstration, and does not wander off on side issues. You do not find Euclid—nor do you find M. Hervieu—straying from his point, and padding out one proposition with extracts from another. But that is just what Mr. Seymour Obermer does in his new play, "The House of Bondage," produced this week at the Afternoon Theatre. His spirit is that of "La Loi de l'Homme," and "Les Tenailles." He sets forth to demonstrate conclusively the iniquity of the English law of divorce—to grind it between the millstones of his logic and his rhetoric. But towards the end of the first act, a wholly new interest—a complication not in the least relevant to the divorce theme—is suddenly sprung upon us. To this complication the whole second act is given up; and only in the third act is the trituration of the divorce laws resumed and triumphantly completed. The rhetorical demonstration-play after the manner of Hervieu is, I repeat, a form of art of which I am not enamored; but if a demonstration we must have, let it by all means be one

> "Whose icy current and compulsive course
> Ne'er knows retiring ebb, but keeps due on."

Logic no less than art cries out against a demonstration with a parenthesis.

Yet Mr. Obermer is by no means without talent, and his first act is by no means without promise. It was probably the very facility of the demonstration he had undertaken that betrayed him into irrelevance. You cannot spend three whole acts in demolishing the English law of divorce. To that end no elaborate concatenation of reasoning is needed; the mere statement of the case carries the conclusion. Mr. Obermer might have said "Q.E.D.," and dropped his curtain, about ten minutes before the end of his first act. I suppose he told himself that the parenthetic complication helped his argument by making the particular case in point seem doubly cruel. But there he was mistaken. The case against an unjust law is much more effective when stated in absolutely typical terms than when accentuated by romantic and—to say the least of it—highly unusual circumstances.

We move, in this play, in the very best society. Sir Vincent Meredith, K.C., M.P., has married the daughter of a Marquis, whose title escapes me and does not matter. But before his marriage, and during the lifetime of the Duke, he has had an intrigue with the Duchess of Banff; and after his marriage, the Duke being now dead, he resumes this left-handed alliance in a very flagrant and cynical way, to the deep humiliation of his wife, the Lady Joan. She seeks distraction in philanthropy, and thus comes across Mr. Paul Bertrand, F.R.C.S., of Harley Street, a star of the operating-theatre, and withal an ornament to his profession and to human nature. These two elect souls are naturally attracted to each other; but—"Charlotte is a married lady, And a moral man is Werther, And for all the wealth of Indies, Would do nothing for to hurt her." Nevertheless, philanthropic interests take Lady Joan so frequently to Harley Street that people begin to talk; and the Duchess of Banff one day happens to drop into the consulting-room just as Bertrand chances, in the heat of an ethical discussion, to have taken Joan's head between his hands, the better to look into the candid depths of her eyes. The Duchess goes off and apparently tells Sir Vincent what she has observed; for that polished and sarcastic reprobate is presently announced. He has a scene alone with his wife, in which he expounds to her the law of divorce; and the exposition, as I said above, practically concludes the argument. His relations with the Duchess being matter of common knowledge, she can get a separation if she wishes it; but as "his wife-beating proclivities are as yet dormant," she cannot get a divorce. To her, on the other hand, the law says, "Be free if you will, but you must degrade yourself first"; and as he knows "her innate refinement," he is sure she will never take this method of escape. Here, then, the "Q.E.D." might quite well have come in; for to expound the law is to condemn it. Nothing whatever, except a good deal of declamation, is added in the subsequent acts to the attack on divorce. The case cannot be strengthened; it can only be complicated by the introduction of irrelevant matter; and that is what happens, in the following fashion.

Just as Sir Vincent has proved to Lady Joan that she cannot free herself except at the cost of her innate refinement, he utters a cry and is seized with a sort of fit. Paul Bertrand comes promptly to the rescue; and then it appears that Sir Vincent has been sent to him by a brother practitioner, he being the only man who can operate with assured success for the removal of a particular sort of tumor on the brain from which Sir Vincent is suffering. The position is a delicate one, but Sir Vincent faces it squarely. "I have only one question to ask," he says to Bertrand, "do you love my wife?" "I do" is the surgeon's reply. "Then," says Sir Vincent, "I place myself in your hands—absolutely."

Though rather foolish in its paradoxical form, this situation is not a bad one as situations go. If we admit —and this is easy enough in the Haymarket, if not in Harley Street—that there is any operation which only one man in the wide world can perform with tolerable security, then it is interesting to conceive him as having to perform it upon a man whose death he cannot but ardently desire. There is room for curious speculation in the matter. Even assuming his professional honor flawless, and his will to save his enemy above suspicion, is Sir Vincent right in thinking himself doubly safe in Bertrand's hands? May not the sense of all that is at stake unnerve him in spite of himself? Other interesting developments suggest themselves; but it is manifest that all this has nothing to do with the true subject of the play—the iniquity of the law of divorce. It is no argument against that law that it may conceivably lead to such a situation as this. A law must be judged by its natural, probable, everyday consequences, not by a consequence which, if possible at all, might not present itself once in a century.

The second act turns entirely on this parenthetic complication, and is, to put it frankly, very bad. Everybody behaves with quite extraordinary tactlessness. One would have thought that, until the operation was over, Bertrand would have been very shy of sentimentalising with Lady Joan; but that elementary point of prudence does not occur to him. One would have thought, too, that if Bertrand is really the only man who can perform the operation with reasonable safety, the Duchess of Banff would have had sense enough and self-control enough to avoid upsetting his nerve. As a matter of fact she travels all the way to Switzerland for no other purpose than to rub into him the extreme delicacy of the situation, and the probability of some fatal slip on his part. I actually began to think that Sir Vincent was to die under the knife, and that the tragedy was to lie in the fact that his death, far from removing the barrier between Bertrand and Lady Joan, on the contrary made it insuperable.

But this was not Mr. Obermer's idea. In spite of all that is done to shake it, Bertrand's nerve remains unperturbed, and Sir Vincent duly recovers. Meanwhile the Duchess of Banff has fought an election for him at home and secured his triumphant return. She motors over to Chamonix to tell him that a place in the Ministry awaits him; and just as, in the first act, the Duchess pops in upon Bertrand caressing Lady Joan, so, in the third act, Lady Joan pops upon the Duchess with her arms round Sir Vincent's neck. All this is extremely maladroit and feeble. Presumably we are expected to feel that Sir Vincent's gross ingratitude in resuming relations with his mistress immediately after his wife has devotedly nursed him through his illness emphasises the senselessness of the law which will not accept this as "cruelty." As a matter of fact, it does not essentially alter the original situation, but merely gives Lady Joan the cue for a declamation against the law, and an appeal to Sir Vincent to make what reparation he can by agitating for its amendment. This Sir Vincent cheerfully promises to do; and then, strange to relate, Lady Joan addresses a similar entreaty to the Duchess. This is, perhaps, the most ridiculous point in the whole play; but, in truth, there is little in this last act that is not more or less ridiculous.

The queer quartette was excellently acted by Mr. Herbert Waring (Sir Vincent), Mr. Aubrey Smith (Bertrand), Miss Eva Moore (Lady Joan), and Miss Beryl Faber (the Duchess). The management of the Afternoon Theatre, by the way, is anxious to have it known that the enterprise is not a private society, or a society of any sort, and that seats may be bought by anyone, in the ordinary way, and on the ordinary terms.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters from Abroad.

ARMS AND THE BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is just nine years since—on February 7th, 1900—Berlin witnessed an uncommon spectacle. Against a naval programme brought before the Reichstag and asking for a duplication of the number of men of war, the Socialists of the capital had convoked meetings of protest in nineteen of the largest halls of Berlin. When the day, or, rather, the evening, came, a number of famous University teachers of political economy—amongst others Professors Adolph Wagner, Lugo Brentano, and Werner Sombart—went into the meetings to preach to the workers of Berlin the doctrine of the necessity and the advantages of a strong fleet. Their endeavors were in vain. The arguments, stated in a very impressive way and with great ability, did not shake the opposition of the Socialist workers. Their unanimous reply was—"We don't believe in these blessings. Increased battleships will only mean increased friction abroad and increased taxation at home." Against the rock of this firm conviction the most seducing suggestions as to the growth of foreign trade following an increase of the navy, proved to be impotent.

But in one respect at least the evening was a gratifying one for these learned propagandists. The workers gave them a respectful hearing. Apart from occasional good-humored interruptions, the "Flottenprofessoren," as they were called, were most attentively heard. And even the few interruptions were severely reproved by the chairmen of the meetings.

Compare with this the treatment meted out the other day at the great assembly of the League of the German Agriculturists to the senior of those great University Nationalists, Professor Adolph Wagner. Wagner is perhaps the most conservative and the most agrarian of his type. In opposition to Brentano, for example, he is a supporter of the policy of agrarian protection. But no sooner did he try to convince the agriculturists of the justice and harmlessness of the proposed estate duty in the Government's Bill for the rehabilitation of Imperial finance, than they brutally hooted the septuagenarian down. Jeering shout followed shout, and the chairman, a highly-educated and wealthy landowner, did not deem it well to protect the man who so often had proved a champion of the cause of the agriculturists.

The scene was in some way a typical illustration of the political situation created by the necessity of paying the bill for the armaments then and afterwards voted by the majority of the Reichstag. Readers of The Nation know what the bill amounts to, and of what nature it is: a deficiency of 25 to 30 millions of pounds sterling has to be covered. For not one-fifth part of this—some four to five millions—do the Government propose direct taxation in the shape of death duties, viz., an estate duty and an inheritance duty on estates left intestate and without near relatives of the deceased. If the proposed estate duty is objectionable at all, it is so because of its weakness and its favoritism to the landed interest. It begins with a tax of ½ per cent. on estates worth £1,000 to £1,500, and ends with a tax of 3 per cent. on estates worth more than £50,000. Agrarian estates are to be assessed, not according to their selling value, but according to the net income the owners draw from them, where deductions of all sorts are allowed. No duty at all is to be paid when the estate has been inherited by the testator no more than five years back, and half the duty when it was inherited between five to ten years back. Further, the inheritors are allowed to pay the duty in ten yearly instalments, so that, e.g., on an estate yielding a net income of £500 a year, and representing actually a possession of at least £12,000, if not more, the inheritors would, according to the Government proposals, have to pay at most during ten years £20 duty a year. With an estate of £150 net income (meaning, perhaps, a real income of £700), duty to the amount of not quite £6 a year would have to be paid.

One must know this in order to appreciate at their full value the roaring protests of the agriculturists—the hypocrisy of the assertion that the duty would undermine Teutonic family life—for are not the agriculturists Teutons of Teutons?—and hinder the development of German agriculture. Your correspondent is not inclined to deny the difficulties of European agriculture. But it argues an inhuman gullibility to believe in the soundness of these protests.

So impudent are they that another Conservative professor, the historian and editor of the "Preussische Jahrbücher," Hans von Delbrück, formerly one of the teachers of William II., has not only come forward to support his colleague Wagner, but has turned the tables round on his assailants and bluntly accused the agrarians that the real ground of their fanatical opposition to the death duty was not the tax itself, but the fear lest the official inventories connected with the tax might reveal the extent of their habitual defalcations in their annual declarations of incomes and fortunes. He asserts, and is proving it, that these defalcations, the amount of the under-assessments of the estates and fortunes of the German agriculturists, if properly investigated, would run to some two to two and a half milliard pounds of taxable property.

There has, of course, been a great outcry against Professor Delbrück's charges, and the patriotic historian is the target of all sorts of abuse from the patriotic agrarians. But he is a fighting man. The financial problems allow of no sentimentalism, and he goes on with his revelations. Many have come forward to confirm his assertions. It has been stated that in Prussia a landholder who should venture to declare the actual income from his estate, would be boycotted by the whole squirearchy in the neighborhood, and semi-official influence would be exerted on him to withdraw the declaration as erroneous. The Prussian Minister of Finance, Herr von Rheinbaben, has tried to deny it, and to clear the officials and the rural assessment committees from being parties to such defalcations, but his denial was feeble and unconvincing. The amount of the defalcations given by Professor Delbrück may be exaggerated, but it is undeniable that they take place.

The extraordinary power wielded by the agriculturists and their strong coherence as soon as their interests are at stake, is best illustrated by the fact that for the present they have succeeded in brushing aside the Estate duty from the list of taxes drawn up by the Financial Committee of the Reichstag. Their influence on the two Conservative Parties, the Catholic Centre Party, and some "wild" members was sufficient to obtain in the committee a majority against the duty.

By this they have brought the whole scheme of financial adjustment to a deadlock. The Committee has replaced the estate duty by the proposal of a tax on fortunes, to be raised in certain quotas by the federated States for the Imperial Exchequer. But this proposal, for which the Freisinnige were weak enough to vote "with reservations," is quite unworkable, and has already provoked desperate protests on the part of the Ministers of Finance of the States, already smarting under the old matricular quota and determined to protect their finance from disorganisation by new and more obnoxious taxes. The tax would neither be a unitarian Imperial tax founded on equal principles of assessment, nor a true federal contribution. It would be a cumbersome and contradictory mixture of both. The idea may be regarded as stillborn.

There we stand at present. The Committee of the Reichstag has begun to discuss the indirect taxes proposed by the Government and the amendments proposed by the Parliamentary groups. But it is a discussion in the air so long as there is no certainty in regard to the direct taxation. Moreover, the protracted discussion of new imposts on goods and public services, by the uncertainty they create, make the trades concerned very uneasy and hamper enterprise in no small degree. No wonder that the feeling of discontent spreads markedly. One moment there was a hint of a probable dissolution of the Reichstag. But it met with little belief. For everybody knows that a general election would at this moment bring back the Social Democrats in largely increased numbers. At meetings of traders, which two years ago voted strongly anti-Socialist, representative Socialist speakers are to-day received with storms of applause.

The Imperial Government plays a pitiable part in these discussions. It wants the money, and is prepared to take it from whatever source and on whatever system it may come. The same lack of principle in regard to finance that was displayed in 1905 by Herr von Hengel, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, is now displayed by his successor, Herr von Sydow. He is ready to accept any tax that would yield revenue. Of any theoretical or political principle of taxation he never displayed a sign.

This is the attitude of a bankrupt, and, in a sense, the Imperial Exchequer is bankrupt. True, it could raise money by new loans. But by doing this it would raise the rate of interest, which is already high enough in Germany. The State would have to pay higher interest for the new loans, and would thus deteriorate the old ones. This much is admitted on all sides. "Experience has clearly shown," one reads in an article by the Privy Councillor, Dr. Seidel, in Berlin, a Governmental authority on finance, in the Conservative "Grenzboten" of March 11th, "that the enormous demands of the Imperial Exchequer have pressed most severely on the market for capital. . . Every time the bank rate showed a tendency to go down, the Exchequer entered the market with new Treasury Bills and counteracted the desirable downward movement." In the 'nineties of the last century the average yearly amount of discount paid for Imperial Treasury bills was between 300,000 and 400,000 marks. Last year it amounted to 13 2-3 millions of marks!

That is one indication of the financial situation created by the mania to become a first-class military power on land and sea at the same time. A heavy bill is to be paid, and many traders are threatened with ruin through the new indirect taxes. Pressure is now put upon the Conservatives to drop their opposition to the death duties, and it may be that in the end they will consent to some compromise, that is to say that they will condescend to be dearly compensated for any concession they may make. All this would be unnecessary if the agrarian interest were not excessively over-represented in the Reichstag and the Diet, and if a workable Parliamentary bloc without the Conservatives were possible. The one presupposes a redistribution of seats, the other an understanding between Social Democrats and the Liberals, and nothing short of a revolution is needed to bring about either.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Schoeneberg, Berlin, March 14th, 1909.

Postscript.—The news of the new British naval programme has been received here with a great calm, if not indifference. There is a feeling of weariness about this costly business. It was regarded as a foregone conclusion that Great Britain would undertake to build new "Dreadnoughts," and people seem to be happy that there appear not more on her new programme. With the quarrel at home about the recovery of the Imperial deficit, there is no inclination to raise the cry for more German "Dreadnoughts." From this point of view one can even be thankful to the Agrarians. Their unwillingness to pay the bill is a distinct help in the movement against naval Jingoism. Public opinion begins to ripen towards a policy of mutual understandings re armaments. The over-swelling bills are making people reflective.

Communications.

ARE "DREADNOUGHTS" WORTHLESS?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I beg the favor of being allowed to point out that the recently issued Navy Estimates provide for either too little or too much—too little if the "Dreadnought" marked, as was claimed for her, such an advance in naval ship construction that all previous ships were thereby made obsolete; too much if she and her "improved" sisters are the frauds I contend that they are.

In this latter connection, I would explain that the "Dreadnought" was conceived and her design settled upon by a Committee before the battle of Isushima, which was fought on May 27th, 1905. She was laid down in October of that year, and the deluded British taxpayer has been allowed and encouraged to believe that she represents the teachings of that battle, which, in reality, practically made her design obsolete before her keel was laid. Despite official and inspired statements to the contrary, her "improved" sisters are in the same category, the difference being only one of degree. Whilst the Admiralty veil of mystery obscures from the taxpayer's view some of the truths concerning those vessels, there is little of consequence that is unknown to our possible enemies. At this stage, however, I conceive it to be of the highest importance, on national grounds, that the following facts should have publicity.

The fundamental fallacy in the "Dreadnought" design is that the latter was based on the supposition, or assumption, that the penetration of armor was necessary for the destruction or disablement of existing war vessels. This penetration involves a huge and extremely heavy projectile fired at a high velocity from a monster gun worked by proportionately heavy, complicated, and easily disabled machinery. That gun and its absolutely necessary adjuncts were the ruling factors in the design of the monstrosity.

The book of Captain Semenoff (the Russian naval constructor deputed to take notes on board the flagship) clearly indicates that none of the Russian ships were sunk in consequence of penetration of armor, but that the battle was decided by high explosive shells acting against the unprotected parts. In his very interesting and valuable account, he wrote:—

> "The 'Suvaroff' (Russian flagship) fired the first shot at a range of 32 cables (6,400 yards), and the guns of the whole fleet thundered forth. In a couple of minutes the enemy began to reply. The first shells flew over us. At this range some of the long ones turned a complete somersault, and could clearly be seen with the naked eye curving like so many sticks thrown in the air. They flew over us, making a sort of wail, different from the ordinary roar. . . . But what struck me most was that these 'portmanteaus,' curving awkwardly head over heels through the air, and falling anyhow on the water, exploded the moment they touched its surface. This had never happened before. After them came others short of us—nearer and nearer. Splinters whistled through the air, jingled against the side and superstructure. Then quite close and abreast the foremost funnel, rose a gigantic pillar of smoke, water and flame. I saw stretchers being carried along the forebridge, and I leaned over the rail. The next shell struck the side by the centre 6-in. turret, and there was a tremendous noise behind me and below me on the port quarter. Smoke and tongues of fire leapt out of the officers' gangway; a shell having fallen into the captain's cabin, and having penetrated the deck, had burst in the officers' quarters, setting them on fire. The shell had passed through the deck house, bursting inside."

Now, it does not require much technical knowledge to see that such shells, "curving awkwardly head over heels through the air and falling anyhow on the water," are not the ones to penetrate armor. Moreover, having such supersensitive fuses as to cause them to explode on touching the surface of the water, they were evidently never meant to penetrate armor.

Confirmation of this obvious conclusion was supplied by Admiral Rozdestvensky, at a public meeting in St. Petersburg, who said:—

> "The Japanese had no submarines in the sea fight; on the other hand, they used a kind of aerial torpedo, which led to the sinking of the Russian Fleet. History will determine who was responsible for the destruction of our ships."

The Japanese vessels were not "all big-gun" craft. They came to close quarters and used medium-sized guns, firing the same kind of high explosive shells—"a kind of aerial torpedo"!

However fatal to the reputations of highly-placed officials an exhaustive, an impartial inquiry may prove to be, the national interests demand that such an inquiry should be made into the question raised by this letter. I feel confident that at the cost of an "improved" Dreadnought twenty small craft could be rapidly built and armed with medium-sized man-handled guns firing "a kind of aerial torpedo," and any four of which craft, properly handled, would be a match for a Dreadnought in the defence of our coasts, or in an attack on the enemy's. Their construction could be entrusted to the numerous yards throughout the country, instead of being confined to a few favored firms. I could adduce evidence in support of this contention, and supplement that evidence by other facts to show that the Admiralty tail has been very violently wagging the Government dog—which is not in the correct order of things, and does not conduce to the maintenance of an efficient navy. The suggestion that official professional advisers are infallible and their advice must be followed to the exclusion of all other is no more reasonable than that the master of a vessel taking a compulsory pilot is absolved from all responsibility in regard to the navigation of the ship in pilotage waters.—Yours, &c.,

C. E. Kelway.

110, Lancaster Street, S.E.
March 16th, 1909.

P.S.—The above letter was written before the important statements made yesterday in the House of Commons by the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Prime Minister. They emphasise the urgency of an impartial investigation into the circumstances which clearly point to the supreme value of "a kind of aerial torpedo" used by the Japanese as compared with the huge armor-piercing projectile upon which the "Dreadnought" design was based. Obviously, if (as I have for years contended in letters to the Government Departments concerned and otherwise, and the Isushima experiences proved) that "kind of aerial torpedo," fired from a medium-sized gun, can effect the desired object, the preposterous claims for the "Dreadnought" design cannot be supported. In other words, for offensive and defensive purposes, "Dreadnoughts" are white elephants, and, if Germany has really copied the design, the position is not so serious as stated in the House of Commons yesterday.

March 17th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

CONSCRIPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I should like to reply to the question put to me in your number of March 13th, although I am glad that the main part of my letter proved to be unanswerable. It seems to be some confusion of ideas to compare the strife that may go on, even at peace meetings, with shooting an enemy from behind a safe covert, or dropping dynamite on him from the skies. The plea for arbitration is surely on the ground that causes of strife do exist, and always will exist, as long as "the wheels of life still run on earth," but that civilised nations have passed the stage when they need cut each other's throats about them. Individuals once thought a duel necessary to settle quarrels which they now quietly take to courts of law. We only propose to extend this to nations.

We do not attempt to judge the individual soldier; we only say that the teaching of Christ is opposed to war, and to the crude attempt to distinguish between races and their ever-changing geographical boundaries. The mixture of races in America, as well as here, is going on so rapidly now that the words "our own race and blood" convey little idea to many people in this land. It is impossible to believe that the "peace of business and of the fear of death" can be attained by the methods being tried to increase armies and navies. If we have to write the "Battle of Dorking" at one time, and the "Englishman's Home" another, and turn on the Yellow Press to the point of hysteria, to frighten people into conscription, we reduce the nation to a weak condition of nerves and tension. The more "Dreadnoughts" we want, the more insecure we must be made to feel. There is nothing bold or courageous in this sort of patriotism—if it is called patriotism. The real question is: What have we to defend ourselves from? If, as is the growing belief of all thoughtful people, our worst enemies are internal, what use is there in developing our animal side alone? What we need is to develop moral and spiritual courage, so that we might stop war at its source. Lord Aberdeen is reported to have said that if his Government had had the moral courage to withdraw their Ambassador from Constantinople at the right time there would have been no Crimean War.

As Mr. Cecil has asked me a question, which I have answered, I should like to ask one in return. Words and phrases like "patriotism," British Empire, "Hearth and Home," "defending country," &c., are like sugar plums stuffed into a child's mouth to prevent noise. We are straight people, and we want to know where conscription will land us before we advance further. Let us at least go into the source and causes of past wars, and see what can be done to prevent them. If we then consent to conscription, and we give up the money needed for social progress, is it for some great and noble end, and what is that end to be? If we develop the physique of the matador, are we to have a glorified bullfight just for a trial of strength? Shall we then find ourselves bound hand and foot to take part, even if we know some diplomat has blundered and caused a quarrel? The greatest man England has produced in modern times, and who had a unique opportunity of knowing the facts, said of conscription for this country: "The Services, the Services, if you give the reigns of government to the Services, they will lead you straight to the Devil." On the whole, does not the Christian principle of brotherhood offer greater national security than this?—Yours, &c.,

March 16th, 1909. S.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I agree with Mr. Cecil that economic compulsion is little better than legal compulsion; in other words, that the fear of starvation is no more a patriotic motive than the fear of punishment. But I think he will find that most of those who are working against one of these evils are also trying to remove the other, and that they consider the perpetual war scares stirred up by Mr. Cecil and his friends are among the more important causes of that unsettlement of the labor market which brings men nearer to starvation.

At any rate, the addition of one such motive to another will not produce that patriotic zeal which Mr. Cecil seems to think will be called out by conscription.

Mr. Cecil refers to compulsion in other parts of civil life. But in those institutions which are to call out the sense of civic duty in men we exercise no compulsion. We do not compel men to vote for members of Parliament or County or Borough Councillors, nor to accept those offices against their will. We compel people, no doubt, to pay taxes, because each man cannot possibly estimate his proper share in the expenditure of the country. But, in the choice of professions (other than military) we leave each man to his own bent. Why, then, should we not in the military profession? Mr. Cecil gives himself away a little in his choice of an illustration of compulsion. Are Englishmen to be treated as children or as men? That is one of the important issues between us and Mr. Cecil.

Mr. Cecil says that I did him an injustice in charging him with attributing to us lower motives than those which actuate him and his friends. I should be glad to think so; and I recognise that, for the length of a sentence, Mr. Cecil struggles hard to be just; but he soon falls back on the belief that his opponents are actuated solely by the "fear of death." Surely there are doctors, miners, firemen, and others who have shown as great a contempt for death as any soldier, and who yet have no desire to be trained to kill.

Mr. Cecil thinks us benighted because we are not roused to enthusiasm by the name Empire. But when has the name Empire produced any healthy enthusiasm on its side in the past?

Plenty of enthusiasm has been evoked, and noble deeds done, in resistance to Empires. It was against an Empire that the Greeks struggled at Marathon and Salamis. It was opposition to an Empire that animated Vercingetorix, Arminius, and Civilis. It was when little England and little Holland were struggling against an Empire that

> "that great fleet Invincible
> Against us bore in vain
> The richest spoils of Mexico,
> The stoutest hearts of Spain."

It was against an Empire that Hofer stood, on his Tyrolese mountains, and that the nations of Europe rallied on the plains of Leipzig; and it was her resistance to a great Empire that has brought so much admiration to Japan.

Empire has always meant rule by the sword and the crushing out of the higher national life; it is because we do not wish to see the greater and nobler traditions of England crushed out by the lust for Empire that we, little Englanders, would rather see a small, free, and freedom-loving country than a huge, unwieldy Colossus merely (in Hamlet's words) "spacious in the possession of dirt."—Yours, &c., C. E. Maurice.

Eirene Cottage, Gainsboro' Gardens, Hampstead,
March 13th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The doctrine embodied in Mr. Haldane's phrase, "a nation in arms," is that it is the duty of every able-bodied Englishman to be prepared to defend his native country. As one whose forebears have for several generations been ardent Radicals, I venture to submit that this doctrine is not, as your leader writer appears to assume, opposed to the traditions of "historic Liberalism." On the contrary, it is essentially a democratic doctrine, and has no connection whatever with the Jingo frenzy of music-hall patriotism. Unfortunately, this Jingo frenzy produced, as a counterblast and a protest, an attitude of mind in certain Liberals which Herbert Spencer described as "the bias of anti-patriotism"; but this attitude, in no way associated with historic Liberalism, is now a thing of the past. Speaking from personal experience, at the last General Election, I can confidently affirm that the enhanced efficiency of the auxiliary forces was one of the "planks" of the Liberal platform, and was a subject which, amongst Liberals, aroused very considerable interest and enthusiasm.

When the Territorial Army was first organised, a number of employers publicly stated that they did not intend to employ "Terriers," because their business would be inconvenienced if their employés were called out for six months' military training. I do not remember reading any protest in The Nation against this "attempt of employers to dictate to their workers what form of service they shall give to the community, and what kind of exercise they shall take outside their hours of work." When, however, employers are ready to sacrifice their own interests for the benefit of the community, we are told that this is "playing with reactionary forces."

In his "Essay on Liberty," John Stuart Mill enunciates his view of Liberalism as follows: "The principle is that the sole end for which mankind are warranted individually or collectively in interfering with the liberty of action of any of their number is self-protection. . . . The only part of the conduct of anyone for which he is amenable to society is that which concerns others."

Now, Sir, applying this principle, it is questionable whether an employer would be justified in refusing to employ persons who were not teetotalers or persons who were not members of the Young Men's Christian Association. But if the existence of the Territorial Army is a matter of self-protection—i.e., the protection of the nation against foreign invasion—it follows that, in respect of military training, an Englishman is amenable to society, and that interference with his liberty of action may be justified under the exception above mentioned.

In conclusion, I would venture to express the conviction that the healthy and virile Liberalism of the present day approves the attitude of Mr. Haldane in this matter, and sees nothing in Liberal traditions or in Liberal aspirations which is inconsistent with the assumption that the defence of his country is as much the duty of a Liberal as the reform of social abuses.—Yours, &c.,

W. A. Jolly.

March 16th, 1909.

[Does our correspondent believe in conscription as the best form of self-protection? If he does, the proper authority to apply compulsion is the State, and not the private employer. If he does not, and he thinks only limited numbers of Volunteers are needed, surely both the spirit and the form of voluntary service should be rigidly maintained.—Ed., Nation.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—There is an aspect of this question of national service on which the criticism of its opponents has not hitherto shed any clear light. They admit that the moral fibre of the nation has become enervated, that the pursuit of selfish pleasure and of the means of procuring it is sapping the vitals of this people. Yet the remedies they suggest, those to which our party-serving politics chiefly incline, are rarely organic, but mainly palliative, tending not to strength and independence of character, but to increasing reliance upon the State to do for us those things which free men in a free State do best for themselves.

What honest man will deny that for sorrowful millions of Britain's sons and daughters there is, in truth, little enough to inspire love of country, and that sense of duty on which a true patriotism is based? But let us go to the root of the matter if we would find the radical cure. Does any thoughtful man doubt, in his own heart and conscience, that the worst of the crying ills of our national life might be swept away in perhaps a single generation by an awakening of that truer patriotism which must find expression in self-sacrifice—in the personal thought of each for the welfare of his fellows?

Yet what more potent lever lies to our hands than in the reawakening of our people to that sense of their country's great past and honorable pride in her future which personal service in youth will most surely foster?

The open air life and comradely association at an impressionable age of the manhood of the nation in the conscious service of their country will not only improve physique and moral, but will knit between all classes bonds of right sympathy and knowledge invaluable to the life of the community. I have seen what a fortnight's yearly camp has meant in health and in esprit de corps to a Working Lads' Club.

What national service becomes will be the responsibility of every member of a self-governing people. We live under a free Government, not a military autocracy. If militarism results, on our own slack and impotent spirit the just punishment will fall.

What is the deepest menace to our national life to-day? Is it not in the absence of all inspiration in the common tasks, the daily toil, of our industrial State? An Englishman no longer feels that though his work be hard and the material reward meagre, "after all, it goes to the making of England." He has forgotten England and his duty to her, being far too preoccupied with thinking about England's duty to him, as represented by a soulless Government or an impersonal Civic Council.

In national service will he not begin to find again that personal inspiration, the larger service, the central, less self-centred, grip of life which sense of country gives?

What is the alternative remedy offered to a people perishing because there is no vision? Internationalism! a generous dream, for neither steamship nor airship can obliterate race; but in the world to-day no more than a vague sentiment of humanitarianism, lacking, like the fakir's mango, both root and substance.

The author of that remarkable book, "The Message," takes for heading of one of his chapters this striking passage from Turgenieff: "Cosmopolitanism is nonsense; the cosmopolite is a cipher, worse than a cipher: outside of nationality there is neither art nor truth nor life; there is nothing."

It is profoundly true. The man without a country, the man who does not truly root his moral and spiritual life in love of his country and his race, is like a tree uprooted, required to exist suspended in the insubstantial air or in unsustaining water.

Surely one may, with reverence, apply to ourselves and to our nation the searching words of Scripture: "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

Men of an alien race, is it not true, we can only rightly love by virtue of that true religion which seeks first to serve God and country?—Yours, &c.,

Charles Cecil.

March 15th, 1909.

[This correspondence must now cease.—Ed., Nation.]

THE EVASION OF THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The recent debate on Small Holdings has established at least one important point with regard to the administration of the Board of Agriculture. Fifteen months after the passing of the Act, the Government have to admit that although there exists in almost every county of England a large unsatisfied demand, so that altogether many thousands of suitable applicants are waiting for land, no case has yet occurred in which the Board of Agriculture have made a report to a County Council that it is desirable that a scheme should be prepared, as the Act directs them to do. When asked in the House of Commons their reason for this omission, their representative, Sir Edward Strachey, replies that "this suggestion"—that the provisions of the Act ought to be carried out—"is a very plausible one," but that "it may be hoped we shall hear no more of it."

Now, sir, the only plausible thing about this "suggestion" is that it is in accordance with the express words of an Act of Parliament; and the only way in which the Government can avoid hearing any more of it is by showing that there are some other provisions, either in this or some other Act of Parliament, which relieve them from the necessity of acting in the way suggested. At present they have shown nothing of the kind. All that Sir Edward Strachey has at present done is to assert that it was the intention of those who introduced the Bill to leave the administration in the first instance entirely to the County Councils; and, in support of his assertion, to quote two passages from speeches made on the second reading of the Bill. This argument, curiously enough, is precisely the same as that of your anonymous correspondent, "A Liberal," in a letter which appeared in your paper on December 12th. Even the same two extracts from the same two speeches—though both are singularly inconclusive—again appear. But neither "A Liberal" nor Sir Edward Strachey can seriously suppose that the intention of those who introduce a Bill is the limit of its effect in law, or that an isolated passage from a second reading speech is any indication whatever of the meaning of an Act of Parliament.

The Act sets out in the clearest possible terms the procedure that is to be followed. The Board, through their Commissioners, are to obtain information as to the extent of the demand for land in the several counties, and local authorities are under an obligation to give them such information as they require. This information is to be embodied in a report which is to state whether it is desirable that a scheme should be made. The report is to be forwarded to the County Council concerned, and if within six months, or within such extended time as may be allowed by the Board, the County Council fail to prepare a scheme, the Board may themselves take action in default. Not only is the procedure perfectly clear, but it is set out in language of the most precise and unconditional kind. "The Commissioners shall ascertain" . . . . "it shall be the duty of every council to furnish information" . . . "the Commissioners shall report the information" . . . "the Board shall forward the report . . . to the County Council." The only occasion on which a condition is imposed is after the report has been sent to the County Council, when the County Council are to have six months at least to prepare a scheme. Up to that point there is nothing in the Act to indicate that there may be any delay whatever in carrying out the procedure that is laid down.

If, then, the Board of Agriculture have acquired this information—as it is reasonable to assume that they have—why have no reports been made? That is at least a simple question, and until some answer is given to it, the attitude of the Board will appear to most people to be the deliberate setting aside by the executive of the provisions made by Parliament.—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP MORRELL.

March 18th, 1909.

THE CENTRAL GLASGOW ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your last issue there appears a most interesting article on the recent Scottish by-elections by "One Who Knows."

I should like, with your permission, to comment very briefly on that portion of the article which deals with the Central Division of Glasgow.

It is much to be regretted that the article is unsigned. If we knew the personality of "One Who Knows" it would be easier to appreciate the precise points he was driving at. As it is, he has said either too little or too much.

He has said too much because he has backed up vague charges by references to particular individuals. I do not know, for instance, by what right he drags in the name of Sir William Bilsland to support his indictment of Glasgow Liberalism; but I confess I shall be surprised to learn that Sir William Bilsland himself has given any countenance or authority for the use of his name in such a connection.

He has said too little because his accusations are vague. At least, personally, I do not understand them, and I think I may claim some knowledge of Glasgow Liberalism. If "One Who Knows" desires to do a real service to the Liberal party in Glasgow, he will come into the open and state exactly what he means by the general charges contained in his article. Liberals in Glasgow will hail with pleasure all frank and free criticism of defects in themselves or their organisation. But such criticism must be specific and detailed if real profit is to ensue.

My own view is that the recent result in Glasgow was not due in any appreciable degree either to the fact that Mr. Bowles was an Englishman and Mr. Dickson a Scotsman (as your contributor appears to think) or to personal shortcomings on the part of Glasgow Liberals (else why did the same man win the seat in 1906?), but primarily to the present depression in trade, which injured the Liberal party both with the merchants who blamed the Government for the present state of things, and with the unemployed workmen, who felt and said that they could not be worse off than they were, and that they would give the other side a chance. Other factors, of course, helped to swell the defeat, but they were subsidiary.—Yours, &c.,

J. W. CLELAND.

March 16th, 1909.

[Surely our correspondent's main contention about Glasgow politics, viz., its changeability, is true on the face of it.—ED., NATION.]

"THE PARALYSIS OF SATIRE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Much of Mr. Chesterton's criticism of modern English caricature, which appeared in your number of March 6th, was excellent, but there are some points in his "Paralysis of Satire" which call for comment. It can hardly be doubted that English caricature would benefit greatly by a judicious and very moderate infusion of the spirit of Gillray, but the manner in which Mr. Chesterton dealt with the question of modern caricature leads one to suppose that he only intended to treat the subject superficially.

Mr. Chesterton speaks of "Punch" several times, and, indeed, "Punch" would seem to have been in his mind throughout. When he said that "caricature in England is not caricature," he was probably looking at the cartoons by Mr. Sambourne and Mr. Partridge, which appear week by week in "Punch." The fact that Mr. Chesterton devotes some little space to the consideration of Mr. Partridge's cartoon of the Irish peasants and Old Age Pensions tends to bear out this belief. Now, "Punch" is an historian, humorist, and sentimentalist; but there are two reasons why the drawings in "Punch," and especially those by Messrs. Sambourne and Partridge, should not be used as evidence to illustrate the decline of English caricature. Firstly, it is not claimed that "Punch" represents the humorous art of this country, but rather, we might say, that it represents the work of one particular school. Secondly, caricature very seldom figures much in "Punch." If we take the artists whose cartoons have delighted the public weekly for about the last half-century, we shall not find one who can be properly termed a caricaturist, or who has laid claim to that title. Leech, Tenniel, Sambourne, and Partridge have all produced masterpieces of their own particular styles, but hardly ever a caricature. The only present contributor to "Punch" who can be called a caricaturist is surely the inimitable E. T. Reed. He is a caricaturist of the jovial, hilarious type. His caricatures bubble over with life and fun, and are, at times, full of stinging satire. Nevertheless, we must not turn to "Punch" for examples of typical English caricature, for the reason that caricature has always taken a subordinate position in that journal.

Let us consider for a moment the caricatures signed "A. M." in the "Morning Leader." Can one say that they lack that biting ridicule which is evidently so dear to the heart of Mr. Chesterton? I think not. It is true that they lack the scurrility of Gillray's lampoons, but are we to think that malice and offensiveness are essential to true caricature? Even Mr. Chesterton will probably admit that they are not. One can appreciate Mr. Chesterton's point, which is that when caricature loses its cruelty it is in danger of becoming weak; but it is possible to carry this argument too far. "A. M.'s" caricatures of Mr. Balfour trying to elude Mr. Austen Chamberlain and Mr. Jesse Collings are far from being weak.

Another true caricaturist is Mr. David Wilson, who possesses the power of endowing his figures with life and feeling, while yet developing their physical peculiarities, so as to render them grotesque—the very essence of caricature. —Yours, &c.,

R. H. Kidd.

Hampstead, March 14th, 1909.

THE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON COMMISSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your last week's correspondent, who signs himself "Interested," finishes his letter with the words, "I look with confidence to Mr. Haldane's Commission to put the professors in their place," and it is plain, from the whole tone of his communication, that, if his views are to prevail, "their place" will be a very humble one. Apparently, "Interested" is one of the class, which the past history of the University of London has done so much to produce, whose whole idea of a University is that of an institution for holding examinations and granting degrees, and who estimate the greatness of a University by the number of candidates and the difficulty of the examination papers. His point of view could not be more clearly shown than by his allowing himself to speak of "those professors on the Senate who have been struggling for some years past to reduce the value of a London degree by reducing its difficulty."

May I say that it has been my privilege to know pretty intimately most of the professors on the Senate, and also to know that they have from time to time expressed a good deal of dissatisfaction with the present constitution and working of the University? But, so far from their object being to reduce the value of a London degree, I assert confidently that their dissatisfaction has arisen from a sincere and single-minded wish to increase the efficiency of the University as an organisation for promoting advanced study and the increase of knowledge. May I also ask "Interested" whether it has ever occurred to him that the one essential and indispensable requirement of a University is a body of professors, and that when (outside the University of London) we hear of the greatness of a University it means the eminence of the men who, for the time being, are counted among its professors? No men are so earnest in promoting the cultivation and extension of any branch of knowledge as those who have already attained the foremost places in the study of it. I therefore trust that the London University Commission, so far from putting the professors in what "Interested" would consider "their place," will do something to make their place such as will attract the ablest men of the time, and will enable them to work most effectually for the advancement of science and learning. —Yours, &c.,

G. Carey Foster.

March 14th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In The Nation for March 13th your correspondent, "Interested," writing on the University of London Commission, states that "since education in the modern sense began to shape itself in the early Middle Ages experience has proved independent examination to be the one and only means of auditing their (i.e., teachers') work.

This statement is inaccurate in fact, and suggests a most misleading analogy.

In Holland the view is generally held that "independent" examiners are a mistake, and that only the teacher is really competent to examine his own pupils. So far as is possible, the Dutch system is that each teacher examines his own men. In the Universities there are no external examiners at all, and there is no discontent on this point either among the students, or the professors, or the general public.

Personally, I have seen the working, from the inside, of both systems—at Oxford and at Leiden. In many respects I prefer the Oxford education; but, so far as methods of examination go, I am quite certain that less injustice is done by the Dutch than by the English system.

The analogy suggested by calling examinations an "audit" is, I believe, pernicious. You can conduct an audit on accurate lines; you have all the necessary evidence. In an examination of a student, unless you know more than an external examiner can ever know, you have only a fraction of the evidence. A far truer analogy than an audit would be judging the financial standing of a shop by looking at the front window. Examinations are, at best, a very rough and ready test, and they are at their worst when the examiner does not know the examinee.—Yours, &c.,

Kirsopp Lake.

Leiden, March 16th, 1909.

A DEFECT IN THE DEATH DUTIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. S. P. Turnbull revives an old controversy.

It would tend towards clearer thinking on this question if we got rid of the idea that it is the beneficiary, in either of the cases quoted, that really pays the death duty. As a matter of fact, it is the State.

The millionaire knows, of course, to what duty his legacy of a cottage worth £300 will render his coachman liable, and if his intention be to provide him with £300, and not only £240, he will make his bequest "free of estate and succession duty," to use the terminology chosen by your correspondent.

The same argument supplies the answer to the more general accusation against death duties—viz., that they are a tax upon capital, and not upon income; and that the country is impoverished by death duties in a sense that it is not by income-tax, because a man provides for his income-tax, but not for his death duties.

To say nothing of the fact that insurance companies offer so-called facilities for providing death duties, every man who estimates what he is bequeathing to those who follow him deducts the death duties in his own mind, and provides accordingly.—Yours, &c.,

D. B. McLaren.

29, Denmark Avenue, Wimbledon,
March 13th, 1909.

HARE HUNTING AT ETON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I call the attention of your readers to the head master of Eton's reply to the Humanitarian League in the current number of the "Humanitarian"? Though not an enthusiastic admirer of our public schools, and the type of mind they tend to produce, I was, I confess, amazed on reading the excerpts from the article given in the "Observer" and "Morning Post." Three points struck me as particularly extraordinary.

(1) Canon Lyttelton says:—

> "I assert that there is no incentive to cruelty whatever in the sport that is carried on here, and as a proof let me ask you to consider another fact.
>
> "There was a time . . . about 1857, when drag hunting, and not hare hunting, was in vogue at Eton. But, if there is one difference more marked than any other between the boys of the present generation and those of fifty or sixty years ago, it is that the former are far less cruel in every respect than the latter."

A "proof" of this kind seems to me to belong in one place only—namely, in a paper on elementary logic—below the indication "Point out the fallacy in the following."

(2) He urges the Humanitarian League to turn its attention rather to the barbarous and unfair rabbit-coursing carried on by many working men. An Etonian implying that the standard for Etonians need be no higher than for "working men"! Neither excessive modesty nor Socialism was wont to be the school failing!

(3) But the plum of the article seems to me the reason why, according to the Canon, the League should attend rather to rabbit-coursing workmen, egret-wearing ladies, and pheasant-shooting gentlemen. It is that "grown-up men and women" are "presumably more accessible to appeal than boys brought up in hunting homes." How often have we been told that if our public schools leave something to be desired as regards intellectual education, this is more than made up for by their attention to and success in moral training. And now the head of our greatest public school, when faced with a moral problem, pleads pathetically that the average adult, with character long since fixed for good or evil, is more "accessible to appeal" than the boys over whom he has authority, and whose moral training is supposed to be his peculiar task and pride.—Yours, &c.,

C. S.

Richmond, March 16th, 1909.

THE EDUCATION OF TURKISH WOMEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I add to my communication of last week that I shall be very glad to receive any subscriptions or donations for the American College for Girls at Constantinople, and to remit them to the treasurer?

Owing to a slight misprint one sentence in my letter may have appeared rather meaningless. I wrote, "Some alteration is bound to come in the social arrangements of the Turks."—Yours, &c.,

Isabel Fry.

239, Marylebone Road, London,
March 10th, 1909.

Poetry.

THE SUBURB.

An Experiment in Heroic Verse.

Where the grey roofs are creeping, sea-like, down
Beyond the sentinel hills of London town;
Where 'bus, and tram, and meaner manners, meet
Beneath a railway bridge that spans a street,
The Suburb spreads. No Muse of high or low
Has deigned its griefs to share, its joys to show.
Large home of littleness, by cynic fate
Doomed to be multiplied, but never great,
Who shall hymn thee, Suburbia? Men have sung
Of happier themes, in other times up-sprung,
The jocund peasant and the amorous knight,
The thoughtless warrior, urged into the fight—
But who shall tell of aught thy sons have seen,
Their dreary days of spiritless routine—
Dark stars, that own nor light, nor name, nor place,
We only know, unknown they people space?
Yet let us closer scan, and we shall find
Laws rule the Suburb as they rule mankind.
Here, as in other worlds, the dwellers deem
Of things, not as they are, but as they seem;
Here man hates man, in strife for useless gain,
And social bounds divide the mount and plain.

On the Hill.

In anxious pride, there dwell upon the hill
The potent vendor of the patent pill,
The rascal lawyer, parasite of grief,
The moral brewer, and sententious thief;
Lords of the business world inhabit there,
Of sanded sugar and of juggled share.
Not wide their lands; no spacious park surrounds
A stately manor, flanked with pleasing grounds;
But monstrous villas, on a little plot,
Flaunt to the pavement all the points they've got.
No care paternal o'er the poor below
Enters the owner's thoughts, with greed aglow.
Toiling for wealth, while little souls applaud,
Each manifolds, by rule, his petty fraud.
In vain the Bible, from its dusty shelf,
Bids man to love his neighbor as himself!
A little lower, winds the High Street down,
And tramcars clank their crowded way to town.
Find here the honest burgess and his shop,
His wares sound value, and goodwill his prop.
Gone all! Instead, a burst of tawdry show
Tells that "——'s Stores will start a branch depôt,"
A scant-paid manager forthwith is due
Sent with "cut prices" for his only cue.
By ceaseless craft he undersells the rest,
Then off he goes—poor wight, he did his best!
The firm, all rivals ousted by his bluff,
Make easy money on inferior stuff.
Such the dull game the High Street plays by day—
Dismal at noon, each evening finds it gay.
See, where the roadway broadens in the glare,
And white-rayed arc lamps fright the blackened air—
'Tis the Parade, 'tis here, when shops are shut,
The grey-cheeked beauties of the Suburb strut.
With cane and quiff the Suburb's youth lurch by,
Bent on chance courtship of a leering eye.
Like hounds, they hunt in couples, till the fair
Accepts her suitor's ogle with a stare.
And this is love! No sanctioning hawthorn shade
Breathes sweetness o'er suburban swain and maid.
They seek the music-hall—a garish shrine—
Where the pert singer speaks the saucy line.
A nobler drama once that stage adorned,
Now by slack wits and pampered players scorned.
Where Romeo wooed his Juliet in the night,
A strident "serio" hails the "Twi-twi-light."

The Outer Darkness.

Around, in drear infinity, there lies
The Suburb's outer darkness. Shall our eyes
Gaze all unmoved upon that brick-bound scene,
Where happy woods and fruitful fields have been?
House upon house abuts, where'er we go,
Street upon little street, row upon row—
All built alike for cheapness—thus we pass
The dwellings of the lower middle-class:
Here shopman, clerk, and such-like, side by side,
Soul-starved by small economies, reside.
Crushed between worlds above them and beneath
With naught to hope from life, nor much from death—
Here still they live! From poky house or flat,
Proud in the manhood of a bowler hat,
Hastes every morn the husband to the train,
At cheerless eve, tired out, drags back again.
The wife, all friendless, save for tradesman's talk,
Divides the empty day 'twixt work and walk.
No little luxuries can e'er complete
Her endless task of making both ends meet!
Yet e'en the Suburb can some virtues show:
Some smutted blooms that their own fragrance know.
What though commercial system battens there,
And taxes glut the householder's despair?
Nature unquenchable her will asserts,
Glows in the garden, 'mongst the drying shirts,
Romps with the children on the nursery floor,
And sits a queen behind the numbered door!
Can selfish wealth a fairer meed proclaim?
Or when did wisdom barter home for fame?
Heirs to the future, till new hopes hold sway,
The Suburb's children wait an ampler day,
When dead arithmetic no more controls,
Nor tricks of trading kill, suburban souls.
Treasure we, then, our Suburb's homes the while,
Where blank walls blossom at a baby's smile—
Glimpses of heaven that are on earth bestowed
Like sunlit pools upon an April road.

S. R. Littlewood.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

UNDER the heading, "The Disorganisation of the Book Trade," Professor Hugo Münsterberg delivers himself in the current "Atlantic Monthly" of some opinions regarding the sale of books which deserve attention in this country as well as in America. After pointing out that American books are seldom to be found on sale in Europe—as far as his remarks apply to England they need much qualification—and drawing attention to the prejudice caused by the injustice of the American copyright laws, he goes on to examine the serious consequences to literature involved in the dying out of the retail bookseller. At present, he says, a book which is not widely advertised or widely criticised does not indicate its existence to the average reader. To make a profit, a book must appeal to a large circle, and if it does not find favor within the first few weeks after publication, it seldom has a second chance. There is no place where books of solid worth that might have a slow, but continuous, sale can be seen. They are swamped by the flood of sensational and superficial volumes which, under present conditions, it alone pays the publisher to produce. Scholarship and academic activity suffer accordingly, for the whole system works against the production of books that are not written for large crowds. He suggests as a remedy that there should be "in every town large, beautiful, well-supplied book stores, conducted with some literary instinct." The old fashioned retail booksellers supplied this want among ourselves, but these have of late years begun to diminish rapidly, and unless this movement is promptly checked, the book trade must suffer. We have more than once pointed out in THE NATION that some method of keeping books before the public for longer than a week or two after their publication ought to be devised in the interests of publishers, booksellers, authors, and readers alike.

* * *

A BOOK called "The New Nation: A Survey of the Condition and Prospects of South Africa," by Mr. H. E. S. Fremantle, will be published next month by Mr. John Ouseley. Mr. Fremantle, who is a son of the Dean of Ripon, was for several years editor of the "South African News," and is one of the ablest and most powerful journalists in South Africa, as well as being a member of the Cape Colony Legislative Assembly. In his coming book he traces the history of the various attempts made to unify the country—attempts which were sometimes encouraged and sometimes discountenanced by Great Britain—until its final accomplishment this year. He also deals at length with the probable future of the country and the problems, legislative, economic, and social, which it has to face.

* * *

NEXT week Mr. Henry Frowde will publish "A Vindication of Warren Hastings," by Mr. G. W. Hastings. The author makes no attempt at a personal biography, his sole object being to clear the memory of Warren Hastings from the crimes with which he has been so often charged. For this purpose he relies mainly upon the three volumes of State Papers edited by Mr. G. E. Forrest, although he also makes use of the facts embodied in Sir John Strachey's book on "Hastings and the Rohilla War." We have not, up to the present, any biography of Warren Hastings that can claim to be final. Gleig's "Memorials," though often right where Macaulay charged it with being wrong, is dull and uninspiring, while Sir Alfred Lyall's more brilliant volume does something less than justice to the man who played so large a part in the making of our Indian Empire.

* * *

M. LOISY will not begin his lectures at the Collège de France until after Easter. He has decided to take comparative religion as his subject, and his lectures will deal with the idea and practice of sacrifice, divination, and prayer in the different religions, and with the evolution of belief. The first series of lectures will be devoted to sacrifice in the religion of Israel, and will occupy the whole time between Easter and the Long Vacation.

PROFESSOR WILBUR L. CROSS has finished a book on "The Life and Times of Laurence Sterne," which will be published during the spring. American criticism owes something to Sterne, were it only in compensation for Allibone's abuse. As an instance of misplaced vituperation, the following sentence deserves quotation: "A standing reproach to the profession which he disgraced, grovelling in his tastes, indiscreet, if not licentious in his habits, he lived unhonored, and died unlamented, save by those who found amusement in his wit or countenance in his immorality." Professor Cross makes use of several hitherto unpublished documents, and he has also the advantage of being able to embody the fresh facts brought to light by Mr. Sidney Lee in his article on Sterne in the "Dictionary of National Biography." We have heard a rumor that Mr. Lee is also contemplating a work on Sterne.

* * *

COLONEL ANDREW HAGGARD'S book, "Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette," which has been postponed from last year, is now in the press, and will be issued within the next few weeks by Messrs. Hutchinson. It differs from most books that treat of the period in not being a history of the French Revolution, for Colonel Haggard stops at the death of Marie Antoinette. Up to that date he gives a very full account of the social and political history of the period from the time of the marriage, when the unlucky King and Queen were little more than children. Colonel Haggard takes an unfavorable view of Lafayette and his negotiations with America, supporting his arguments by material gathered in the United States. The famous affair of the diamond necklace is told at length, and upon this Colonel Haggard is also able to throw some fresh light. Altogether, the book promises to be one of great interest. Another contribution to the same subject is Mr. Hilaire Belloc's study of Marie Antoinette, which will probably appear in the early autumn.

* * *

MRS. EDITH WHARTON is best known as a writer of fiction, though she has also written quite a considerable number of poems, which have appeared from time to time in the magazines during the past fifteen years. These have now been collected and, with some additions, will shortly be published in a volume, bearing the title "Artemis to Actæon, and Other Verses." By the way, the novel which recently ran through the "Revue des Deux Mondes" was not, as many people thought, a translation, but was written in French by Mrs. Wharton herself. It is interesting as a tour de force, but cannot be compared with her best work in English.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Turkey in Revolution." By Charles Roden Buxton. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire." By T. R. Glover. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Nineteenth Century Teachers and Other Essays." By Julia Wedgwood. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Springs of Helicon: A Study in the Progress of English Poetry from Chaucer to Milton." By J. W. Mackail. (Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.)

"George Selwyn and the Wits." By S. Parnell Kerr. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Beethoven's Letters." Edited by A. C. Kalischer. Translated, with a Preface, by J. S. Shedlock. (Dent. 2 vols. 21s. net.)

"The M.P. for Russia: Reminiscences and Correspondence of Madame Olga Novikoff. Edited by W. T. Stead. (Melrose. 2 vols. 32s. net.)

"Socialism in Theory and Practice." By Morris Hiliquit. (Macmillan. 6s. 6d. net.)

"Brighton: Its History, Its Follies, and Its Fashions." By Lewis Melville. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Gentlemen Errant, Being the Journeys and Adventures of Four Noblemen in Europe during the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries." By Mrs. Henry Cust. (Murray. 12s. net.)

"Man and the Bible." By J. Allanson Picton. (Williams & Norgate. 6s. net.)

"Dromina." By John Ayscough. (Bristol: Arrowsmith. 6s.)

"Histoire du Peuple Bulgare." Depuis ses Origines jusqu'à nos jours. Par Georges Bousquet. (Paris: Chaix. 3 fr. 50.)

"La Nouvelle France Catholique." Par Paul Théodore Vibert. (Paris: Schleicher. 10 fr.)

"La Révolution Française et ses Détracteurs d'Aujourd'hui." Par Léopold Lacaur. (Paris: Fournier. 1 fr.)

"La Revanche de Paris." Roman. Par Jules Lafourgue. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 3 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE STORY OF THE "NOETICS." *

It is often said that it was by the Tractarian movement that Oxford was roused from the slumberous, not to say stertorous, condition in which it was found in the middle of the eighteenth century by Gibbon and Adam Smith. This is not so: and Mr. Tuckwell has supplemented the side-lights thrown, in his "Reminiscences," on the Oxford of Newman and Pusey by a singularly readable and suggestive account of the Oriel "Noetics," to whom the credit of the revival of learning in the University is due. John Eveleigh, Provost of Oriel 1781-1814, was the inaugurator of the public examination for the B.A. degree, which was the wedge that broke up the old order. Its results were far-reaching. "There arose, said Pusey sadly, looking back upon the earlier decades of the century, a spirit of free inquiry: old institutions, accepted principles and beliefs, were rudely and fearlessly investigated, and called upon to justify themselves at the bar of utility and reason." Tractarianism deflected a portion of the stream from its legitimate course: the running water became stagnant, and, instead of fertilising, spread malaria over the land. But the main current, if diminished, was not checked. The Noetics of the 'twenties were the spiritual ancestors of Maurice and Robertson, of Stanley and Jowett; and, through them, of the scientific and progressive theology, in and outside the National Church, of our own time. Coplestone and Whateley, Arnold and Hampden, Hawkins and Baden Powell, were men of whom any University might be proud; and who, in their different ways, represent the spirit of Oxford and the genius of the Church of England more truly than the Pillar-Apostles of the Movement of '33. The most consistent of these ended their days in a foreign communion: all stood for a revolt against English theology, English religion, and English thought.

The Noetics stood apart from party politics. As reformers they were opposed to Georgian Toryism; but they had little in common with men of the type of Brougham and Jeffrey. Essentially academic in temper, they distrusted Utilitarianism, and stood for liberal, as distinguished from technical, education; Coplestone broke more than one lance successfully with the formidable "Edinburgh Review." To his scholarship he added a considerable aptitude for affairs; in his six years as bursar he trebled the income of his college; he was an authority on Currency and Poor Law reform; Peel and Mackintosh were his personal friends. As Bishop of Llandaff (1828-49) he was a striking disproof of the modern axiom that learning is a disqualification for the episcopal office. "We find him riding on horseback into every corner of his diocese, holding confirmations in villages where no bishop had ever been seen, extorting by appeals to their sense of justice or shame large sums from rich ironmasters for the populations which they had drawn into the South Wales mining villages. He exercised patronage with conscientious care, promoted churches, schools, and glebe houses with large assistance from his private purse, enforced clerical residence, insisted on Welsh-speaking clergy where not thwarted by patronage rights, increased curates' salaries, and evinced a fraternal spirit towards the Separatists, who formed the great majority of the population."

Caution, common sense, straightforwardness—such were his characteristics: it may be doubted whether we stand on a higher level to-day.

Whateley was a figure cast in a rougher mould. It is strange to remember his early intimacy with Newman: in manner, mind, dress, and habits, no ecclesiastic was ever less ecclesiastical than he. A pupil recalls his costume in 1813—"peagreen coat, white waistcoat, stone-colored shorts, flesh-colored stockings." He lectured lying full length on a sofa, a pipe in his mouth. He was a voracious eater: his manners, by a reaction (his friends said) from a natural shyness, were rough and uncouth. Withal children loved him, and he them; under a somewhat truculent exterior beat the kindest of hearts. He was a born teacher; he drew out his pupils' minds, and, instead of suggesting conclusions, encouraged them to think for themselves. His presence in the University during the Tract movement (1833-45) would have been invaluable: "It was an evil hour," wrote Arnold, "which took him from Oxford, where he was doing great and certain good," to an office for which he was not specially fitted, and which could have been better filled by a lesser man. The episcopal suaviter in modo was wanting to him. A stranger meeting him in company, and hoping perhaps to embarrass him, knelt for his blessing. The Archbishop gave it, but remarked (the story goes) in an audible aside, "Answer a fool according to his folly." The anecdote is at least ben trovato: he detested unreality in every form. When editing Arnold's remains, A. P. Stanley urged the suppression of certain sermons, on the plea that they might "give pain to humble-minded persons." Whateley was referred to. "It would be a sorry sermon," he answered, "that did not. Humble-minded men are especially to be guarded against; the word means what used to be called arrogant and insolent." His hostility to the Tractarians was uncompromising.

> "He saw from the first their inevitable Romanising tendency, deplored their diversion of the University from its legitimate studies into the mazes of theological controversy, was shocked by the disingenuousness of the Hampden prosecution, viewed as immoral and dangerous the doctrine of 'Reserve,' the assumption by the clergy of priestly power, the investment of absolution and benediction with sacramental force."

They returned his antipathy with interest. The correspondence that passed between him and Newman in 1834, printed in a note to the "Apologia," will be remembered; and when, in the following year, his chaplain, Hinds, was made Bishop of Norwich, he (Hinds) received a letter from the Tractarian leaders, calling upon him to define his religious opinions. It is satisfactory to know that this impertinence was met with the rebuff that it deserved. As a politician his record is unimpeachable. He supported the suppression of Irish sees, under the Church Temporalities Act, which called forth Keble's famous Assize Sermon in 1833, and advocated the payment of the Roman Catholic clergy by the State. Had this measure been adopted, the course of Irish history would, in all probability, have been other than it has. Here, however, as throughout the intercourse between the two countries, the peacemakers were defeated—peace was not to be. He was in favor of an Irish-speaking clergy; he urged, but in no party spirit, the inspection of convents; he opposed Repeal—"while the English Parliament governed Ireland abominably, an Irish Parliament (he said) would govern it much worse." His scheme for abolishing the Veto of the House of Lords may be recalled in view of present controversies.

> "Let it," he said, "be incumbent on the Upper House, after throwing out a measure sent to it by the Commons, to transmit a written statement of their reasons. If, after considering this, the Commons in the next succeeding Session re-introduce the rejected measure, and pass it by a majority of the whole House, let it become law without formal acceptance by the Lords."

It is to be regretted that Arnold's success as a schoolmaster has to so great an extent eclipsed his reputation as a divine. Here was his real greatness. He was of the race of the prophets: "I have a testimony to deliver, and I must write, or die." He possessed in a singular degree what was a characteristic of the Oriel school—precision in the use of words. In Coplestone and Hawkins this precision bordered on pedantry: with Arnold, as with Whateley, it was like Ithuriel's spear:—

> "No falsehood can endure
> Touch of Celestial temper, but returns
> Of force to its own likeness."

His religion was evangelical: he saw God—it is scarcely too much to say that, anticipating Ritschl, he saw Him only—in Christ. Hence his intense antagonism to the revival of medieval theology and observance. There was "One Mediator": ecclesiasticism, he held, with its dogmas, its institutions, its priesthoods, supplanted Him, and built up a barrier between man and God.

> "To think and speak of the Church as a separate body controlling morals and religion is fatal to this ideal. A Christian State is a Christian Church. He thus received in its fullest sense the Reformation doctrine of the King's Supremacy; a supremacy of the Monarch as representing the Christian State > in all causes civil or spiritual, over all persons, lay or clerical. The notion that the clergy compose the Church, that a close corporation of priests and bishops govern it, he held to be a fatal falsehood, looking, with Coleridge, on the separation between laity and clergy as the first and fundamental apostasy. He would restore Church discipline—more frequent services and communions, crosses and wayside oratories, religious orders of men and women without the snare of perpetual vows. If once the usurpation of a clerical body was removed, all these, he believed, would fall into their place: there would emerge a National Church, which, with whatever diversities of ceremonial or opinion, would be united by acceptance of Christ's leadership and communion with His Spirit."

* "Pre-Tractarian Oxford." A Reminiscence of the Oriel "Noetics." By the Rev. W. Tuckwell, M.A. Smith, Elder & Co. 7s. 6d. net.

This was substantially Luther's standpoint. Were we asked to name a modern presentation of it, we should point to Harnack's famous essay, "What we should learn, and not learn, from the Church of Rome." Had the English Church accepted it her prospects would be brighter, her hold on the nation surer, than is the case to-day.

Did space permit, we should gladly quote Mr. Tuckwell's "Postscript." It is not written on the lines of what are called Church principles: its outlook is rather that of the citizen than of the priest. But the future is with it; the attitude which it represents is that of traditional English religion; it can stand, it has stood, the criticism under which sacerdotalism succumbs.

NAPOLEON'S CHAMBERLAIN.*

In many a country house there is to be seen a hale old gentleman, endowed with grand manners and an anecdotic faculty, which plays around half-forgotten scenes, and enlivens the bucolic calm of the present with something of sunset splendor. He takes interest in stock and trees, but his mind evidently moves amidst loftier themes. At heart he is not a squire, but a courtier or diplomatist.

Such a figure was that of the Comte de Rambuteau during his green old age spent amidst the well-wooded slopes of his estate in the Maconnais. He was a true son of Burgundy. Descended from a family of its petite noblesse, he inherited a love of that bounteous land, whose climate and products beget in the character of its people a happy compromise between the toughness of the north and the vivacity and passion of the south. De Rambuteau was remarkable for the constancy of his aims and affections, the width of his outlook, and the geniality of his nature. It was this happy balance of his faculties which ensured his success amidst the many storms of that period. He was eight years of age when the Revolution began; and his youth coincided with the sordid strifes of the Directory, relieved as they soon were by the triumphs of Bonaparte in Italy and the Orient. Fortunately for him, his father had refused to "emigrate," believing that it was a Frenchman's duty to stand by his country at all costs. Such, too, was the conviction of the son. Madame Lamartine, who was rearing the future poet in a house near by, wrote of the young Count: "Everything about him indicates nobility and loftiness of character, and absolute integrity."

These characteristics procured for him the hand of the daughter of Count Louis de Narbonne, one of the former Ministers of Louis XVI., who came into favor once more under Napoleon's régime; and it was largely his influence which brought the young de Rambuteau to the front. It was not until after the divorce of Josephine and the advent of Marie Louise that he became Chamberlain to the Emperor, whose desire to enhance the dignity of his surroundings may perhaps account for the choice of the tall and dignified young noble. In any case, the choice was a happy one. De Rambuteau seems to have maintained the strict rules of the Marie-Louise Court, with the minimum of friction; and he was well liked both by the sovereigns themselves and by the many aspirants whose access to the Emperor's cabinet he firmly barred.

The value of the "Memoirs" is impaired by their remoteness from the times which they describe. They were composed late in life, and here and there they blur the outlines of events and soften down tones whose crudity convinces even while it offends. As his grandson says in his preface: "They possess the perfume of a generous old wine." True; but in the case of Memoirs, sharpness rather than mellowness is a recommendation, at least where incidents rather than opinions are concerned. Thus, it is difficult to accept de Rambuteau's statement that only once was Napoleon angry with him, namely, when he allowed courier after courier to enter the cabinet with tidings of the reverses of Masséna in the Torres Vedras campaign. That he should feel the weight of his master's anger then, merely for doing his duty, was natural enough; but we feel a doubt whether other cases of hasty temper are not generously slurred over. To mention other instances would not have belittled the Emperor in the eyes of posterity; for everyone knew that his wrath was easily kindled, and that for the most part it soon died down. The writer refers to some cases when the great man was appeased by a happy retort. Thus, when Napoleon mentioned to M. de Narbonne the royalist opposition of his mother, and suggested that she had no liking for him, there came the apt reply: "No, Sire, she has got no further than admiration." Or, again, the same courtier disarmed his resentment concerning a duel with an ex-Vendéan, for which he was in part responsible, by reminding him that his officers were now as jealous of the honor of the Napoleonic dynasty as they formerly were of their own reputation and epaulets.

De Narbonne is the second hero of the early part of this book. We have a charming sketch of him during the retreat from Moscow, keeping up amidst those scenes of horror the cheeriness and elegance of an old noble, inspiring the rank and file with his own daring, "leaping from the horse [surely not 'horses' (!)] that sank under him, in order to jump on the hind seat of the Imperial Berline, next to Marshal Bessières." Even more important were his services as Ambassador at the Court of Vienna in 1813, when, as is here set forth, he tried to convince his master of the need of peace for France, or of securing the neutrality of Austria by timely concessions during the armistice. In vain did he urge him to secure "a peace, even though it were only a truce." The rest of de Narbonne's remarks refute the oft-repeated statement of Napoleon's St. Helena "Mémorial" (here quoted in the note), that his envoy had probed the perfidity of Austria, and therefore was the innocent cause of her declaring against France. This is contrary to the whole tenor of de Narbonne's statements.

During these terrible months de Rambuteau was acting as Prefect of the Simplon Department (Canton Valais). His efforts to appease the inhabitants (still sore at their annexation to France in 1810), to push on public works, especially the Simplon road, and to investigate the cause of cretinism, which claimed 4,000 victims among a population of 75,000, will be found of great interest, as showing the way in which an able and honest official succeeded in strengthening the fabric of the Empire at a vital point. On the collapse of 1814 the young Prefect secured the retreat of his large band of officials by a daring move through the deep snows of the Col de Balme and Chamonix valleys, and brought nearly all of them safely through into Savoy. Equally spirited was his administration of the Department of the Loire—his next charge. Incidentally, his narrative serves to weaken the charges made against Marshal Augereau for his slack defence of Lyons against the Austrians. It would appear that old age and discouragement, rather than intentional disloyalty to Napoleon, were the final cause of the surrender of that important city. Certainly Augereau did his duty at first.

Loyalty to the interests of France rather than the spell cast by Napoleon led the Prefect to rally to the Emperor during the Hundred Days. But he, like Caulaincourt and Sémonville, was dismayed at the nomination of the blindly devoted Maret, Duc de Bassano. Very noteworthy is the remark of the keen-sighted physician, Corvisart, about Labédoyère: "Look at that idiot, who believes that it is possible for a man to act in opposition to all his proclivities." De Rambuteau also came to doubt the zeal of the Emperor for constitutional principles. As Prefect of Montauban, de Rambuteau did much to calm the passions of Catholics and Protestants in the stormy days after Waterloo.

During the later years of his career, spent as Prefect of the Seine, he rendered even more signal services by improving the education, the drainage system, and the public works of Paris. Everyone has heard of Baron Haussmann; but he only completed what de Rambuteau began during the Orleans monarchy. The riddle of French political life can only be understood by reading works such as this. Underneath the surface, with its wars and revolutions, there are unseen yet potent forces making for prosperity and order. These lie in the thrift of the peasantry and the intelligent, toilsome efforts of administrators like le piocheur, de Rambuteau.

* "Memoirs of the Comte de Rambuteau." Edited by his Grandson. Translated by J. C. Brogan. Dent.

The translation runs well; but the work is disfigured by several misprints, e.g., "Foucher," "Turgau" (for "Torgau"), "Hardeck" (for "Haddick"), and "indefiled." Notes are also needed to point out slips in the Count's narrative, as when Ney's chief exploit in 1812 is placed at the Beresina. It should be at the Dnieper. And is there the least truth in the rumor (p. 137) that Napoleon, early in the Hundred Days, once thought of accepting a place of retreat in Hungary?

A SOCIOLOGICAL DICTIONARY.*

Theories of social evolution a clever writer will construct to order. Taking a new idea that has just percolated through from physical science and has seized the popular imagination, he can easily find a selection of social happenings that will fit in with it, and, stringing the whole together, he will present it on the new "scientific" theory of the society. For any genuine theory of social evolution, the first requirement is to extend the conception of science so that it is no longer restricted to the physical, the ponderable, and the mechanical, but is applied to any portion of the world of experience that is being impartially, accurately, and systematically studied. The second, and most difficult, step is to gather into a form available for the student the piles of information which the inductive study of social evolution requires. The only alternative to the alluring, but arbitrary method of the selective hypothesis is that of the hard, steady grind upon the facts themselves. Seeing that the whole life of humanity from the lowest to the highest is in question, it will be realised that the field is large, and the data difficult to get into any reasonable compass. The inquiry is, in fact, at a stage where encyclopædic compilations of so much as is actually ascertained of social history have a peculiar value, and Dr. Hastings and his colleagues are therefore performing a genuine service to science in producing the "Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics," of which the first volume is before us. The scale of the work is sufficiently indicated by the fact that though it does not exhaust the letter "A," it contains 913 double-column pages. The scientific and philosophic adequacy of the general treatment may be judged from the list of contributors, which include such names as Professors Baillie, Burnet, Rhys-Davids, Dr. Dill, Dr. Haddon, Mr. Edward Clodd, Mr. A. E. Crawley, Professor De Groot, Mr. E. S. Hartland, Principal Jevons, Professor H. Jackson, Dr. Douglas Morrison, Mr. J. L. Myers, Professor Flinders Petrie, Professor J. A Thomson, and many others of equal reputation. It remains only to indicate the plan of the work. To give any account of the actual contents of so vast a miscellany is, of course, out of the question. What the student will ask is whether, the general level of scholarship being fully adequate, the selection and arrangement of subjects is such as to make the encyclopædia really useful as a work of reference.

The problem is one of great difficulty owing to the overlapping of all sociological subjects, and the difficulty of securing the desired treatment of any one of them except from a specialist. An instance presents itself in the very first article after the letter A—which has a footing in sociology as a symbol. "Abandonment" of the helpless is a practice found in various parts of the uncivilised world. It is known in the form of the abandonment of the sick and aged, and also of the exposure of infants. It clearly might be dealt with, and will certainly have to be referred to, under those three heads. It is also specially characteristic of certain peoples, ancient and modern, and is, perhaps, not to be thoroughly understood in any one case without some reference to the other circumstances of the people. Hence it will readily be understood problems of arrangement arise before which the stoutest editorial heart might quail. Dr. Hastings's solution is to get an excellent general article on Abandonment and Exposure by Mr. P. Giles, followed by a series—not in this case as complete as in some others—of special studies of the practice among the North and South American Indians, the Hindus, and the ancient Persians. On the same principle, but far more elaborately worked out, we have in the section dealing with Art which occupies, with the illustrations, no less than 86 pages, first an introductory discourse of "Origins," by Yrjö Hirn, and then a score of monographs on the art of the various religions of the world.

Inevitably in such a labyrinth of interwoven subjects there is room for the objector who will find one topic overemphasised, and another passed over too lightly for his taste. The editor is clearly put at times to the device of referring the reader to a later part of the alphabet. Thus, elaborate as is the account of art, for that of the Chinese we are still referred to the letter C. More serious is the case of Animism. This is the one definite type of religion of world-wide significance coming within the limits of the present volume and we should have expected the fullest treatment. In fact, we get two inadequate pages with a reference at the end to "soul" and "spirit," which are alphabetically a long way off. It follows immediately on an article of immense learning and 52 pages in extent on "Animals," by Mr. N. W. Thomas. The article being concerned almost exclusively with primitive ideas about animals has in point of fact a close relation to animistic ideas in general, and in a philosophical treatment of the subject would be brought into relation with them. On the other hand, in all this space given to animals we find no heading for the growth of civilised ideas about the treatment of animals and the ethics of field sports and vivisection. Some of the metaphysical articles again we think are open to criticism as being more the statement of a view than the impartial exposition of historical theories, which is what the student demands in a work of reference. Thus the article on the "A Priori" is more concerned to argue for a modified Kantianism than to set out both sides of the controversy, and the writer appears, like many Germans, to be inadequately acquainted with the work of English critics. But it seems mere carping to pick out inevitable defects of detail such as these. The volume, as it stands, is invaluable to the student of sociology, and if the Editor will carefully avoid the predominance of any particular "tendency" in further instalments, he will have made a contribution of permanent utility to his subject.

* "Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics." Edited by James Hastings. M.A., D.D., with the assistance of John A. Selbie, M.A., D.D., and others. Vol. I. A—Art. T. & T. Clark, Edinburgh. 28s. net.

AN ARTIST AND ANOTHER.*

In "The Gifted Family" Mr. Barry Pain has achieved a charming study, one highly original, though of less serious import than "Lindley Kays." The novel holds one from the first page, for every touch, subtle and unexpected, is the work of an artist with an acute eye for shades of social types and social manners:—

> "Hicks is very good, of course, but I prefer the real drama, same as we had to-night—'Lord Stanwood's Renunciation,' you know."
>
> "Nice piece?"
>
> "Grand! You ought to have seen George Alexander as Lord Stanwood. I can't explain exactly how it happens, but he's going to give up the girl he's in love with—and she's in love with him too, mind you. It's just at the end of the third act he tells her. There he stands, in his dress clothes, holding her hands, and he says, 'It's not because I . . . I don't . . . love you, darling'—just like that, with pauses in between. I tell you, you felt it all down your back. And the curtain was no sooner down than up jumps Mr. Bensley. 'I'm going off for a gargle,' he says, 'if you ladies have no objection.' That kind of thing simply grates on me."

The speaker is Miss Ida Prendergast, of the gifted family of Prendergast, stationers, in the Finchley Road,

* "The Gifted Family." By Barry Pain. Methuen. 6s.
"Septimus." By W. J. Locke. Murray. 6s.

and her appreciation of the "real drama" of Mr. George Alexander, an ideal Lord Stanwood, and her recognition of Mr. Bensley's commonness, places her socially to a marvel. The whole Prendergast family is highly gifted. Ida, who has ambitions of going on the stage, gives recitations and lessons in elocution. Juliet, who is "delicately strung," has her music pupils, Fred is studying art, with a view to "a year in a good studio at Paris," and their father, Mr. Prendergast, has an undying admiration for the works of George Meredith. Mr. Prendergast's figure is a good example of how a character starts into life from the artist seizing and accentuating a nucleus of one or two tiny traits for the growth of an individuality. Although we are only told three or four little facts about Mr. Prendergast, the reader can swear that he is as familiar to him as any type of man he meets in the flesh. The point is that it is these simple little human touches that count in conveying character, however commonplace the effect may appear to those who miss the fine shade of irony: "Mr. Prendergast adjusted his gold-rimmed pince-nez and removed the pewter cover from the dish before him. 'Aha!' he observed cheerfully. 'What have we here? Buttered eggs. Excellent.'" . . . "Mr. Prendergast brought his old favorite, 'Richard Feverel,' and the local newspaper into the drawing-room. At present he was reading the local paper. Sandra, who had not been allowed to take any part in the housework, went to the piano. . . . Mr. Prendergast put down his paper. 'One of my aunts—dead and gone many years ago,' he said, 'wrote poetry, chiefly of a religious character. I believe I have the volume in manuscript somewhere.' His eye lighted on 'Richard Feverel.' 'Ah, Sandra,' he said, 'if you could only give us something like that!' Sandra laughed a little disconsolately. Her father resumed the local paper."

The extremely delicate touch of humor of the little passage will show the discerning reader that this picture of "the gifted family" lives, because it is exact in drawing, and it is exact because the author knows the inner life of his characters and their natural limits. Mr. W. S. Locke, on the other hand, in "Septimus," seems to be deliberately inventing types of eccentric individuality for the purpose of amusing us, but they do not amuse us, simply because "the touch of nature" that would make them akin to us is lacking. In all Mr. Locke's ambitious pages there is nothing to equal the thumb-nail sketch Mr. Barry Pain gives us of the little servant maid, Stafford: "Stafford opened the drawing-room door and put her decorated head in. 'Dinner's in,' she said gloomily. 'And,' said Mrs. Prendergast, 'if I've told that girl once, I've told her twenty times that's not the way to do it.'" And again: "Stafford said good night, closed the door, and instantly reappeared. 'Poached or b'iled for to-morrow?' she inquired. She wasted nothing—not even words. With this breakfast problem settled, she retired to her distant attic." It is the way Stafford's mind worked that the artist has seized to amuse us, by his subtle observation of her manners. But Mr. W. J. Locke's characters, on the other hand, irritate us and weary us by never acting in accordance with human nature, but in flat defiance of it. It seems, at first sight, highly effective and original to invent the figure of Clem Sypher, the enthusiastic proprietor of an American quack medicine, who calls himself the "Friend of Humanity," and spends millions of pounds in "freeing the tortured world from plague"; but when we learn in the middle of the story that, after trying the Cure on his own leg with disastrous results, he cried, "It can't be! it can't be!" "blinding his face with his hands and dashing them away at last with a passionate gesture," our suspicion is confirmed that Mr. Locke has no eye for human nature. The pendant figure of Septimus Dix, the dreamy-minded, star-gazing idealist, who invents the most deadly improvements in naval guns in his fits of abstraction, and has not the faintest idea of turning his invention to account, although he is badly in need of money, is also, at first sight, highly ingenious; but we soon discover that Dix is simply an idea dressed up as a man, whose function it is to jerk forth incongruous words and actions like a child's jack-a-dandy jerks out its arms and legs. Thus Septimus, who is passionately in love with the heroine, Zora, offers to "tie himself for life" to her sister Emmy, who "has disgraced herself, just for the sake of shielding her." The solution of such a situation is, of course, not beyond the bounds of probability; but how airily the idealistic Mr. Locke spins one fantastic motive after another for his hero, on the hypothesis that if one doesn't meet the case another may:—

> "Deep down in his heart he loved Zora. . . . At any rate, he was free to bring her his daily tale of worship, to glean a look of kindness from her clear eyes. This was his happiness. For her sake he would sacrifice it. For Zora's sake he would marry Emmy. The heart of Septimus was that of a knight-errant, confident in the righteousness of his quest. The certainty had come all at once, in the flash of inspiration. Besides, was he not carrying out Zora's wish? He remembered her words. It would be the greatest pleasure he could give her—to become her brother, her real brother. She would approve. And beyond all that, deep down also in his breast he knew it was the only way—the wise, simple, Heaven-directed way." . . . .
>
> "He danced his jostled way up Holborn, till the City Temple loomed through the brown air. It struck a chord of association. He halted on the edge of the kerb, and regarded it across the road with a forefinger held up before his nose as if to assist memory. It was a church. People were apt to be married in churches, sometimes by special licence. That was it! A special licence. He had come out to get one. But where were they to be obtained? In a properly civilised country doubtless they would be sold in shops, like boots and hair-brushes, or even in post-offices, like dog-licences."

There is scarcely a single touch here that is humanly convincing or well observed. It is all facile, in the air, and arbitrary. There is, indeed, no reason, that we can see, why Mr. Locke's puppets should not run on to all eternity with their conversational fireworks, their incredible behavior, and their superficial pleasantries, for the world in which they move is not the real world, and the atmosphere they breathe, though idyllically suburban, is not of our brick and mortar suburbs. Mr. Locke's two heroines, the emancipated young widow, Zora, and the tearfully nebulous Emmy, are not so unreal as the men, Clem Sypher and the fantastic Septimus Dix, because they have in them a real sentimental or emotional yearning, but how fluffy and ill-determined are their feminine outlines in comparison with Mr. Barry Pain's flesh and blood young women, Ida and Juliet and Sandra. The fact is, Mr. Locke is the spokesman of the suburban ideal, with its sentimental vagueness, its half-baked ideas, its atmosphere of villa longings towards a make-believe romanticism. Whereas Mr. Barry Pain knows what his suburbs stand for, penetrates their humanity, and shows us how to enjoy and sympathise with its types, even while defining with smiling exactness their patent limitations.

And this is the advantage that the quiet humorist possesses over the writer of sentimental fantasy: because he analyses human nature closely, and has the courage of his insight into the prosaic and the common, when he meets with strands of human nature of rarer, finer quality, he speaks with all the more authority. The character of Sandra, this thoughtful, passionate, and modest child who falls in love with her employer, Dr. Saraden, is quite a triumph of delicate penetration into a young girl's heart. Mr. Barry Pain has created a beautiful thing in the figure of Sandra, and we may note that it is just in such a family as the Prendergasts that one comes across, now and then, a girl or woman untouched by the pettiness of her environment. Dr. Saraden, and the episode of his insane wife dying just in the nick of time to ensure Sandra's married happiness, are the only conventional elements in "The Gifted Family"—a novel which, in point of style, outlook, and original flavor, is a true work of art.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

It is gratifying to see that Messrs. Williams & Norgate have just issued the second edition of Professor Harnack's great work on "The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries." The second edition has been considerably enlarged and revised by the eminent historian. He has now overcome his scruples with regard to maps, and the present edition contains a number of admirable maps, which materially facilitate the understanding of the text. It is undoubtedly very difficult for the ordinary reader to follow the diffusion of Christianity throughout the ancient world unless he is provided with maps specially constructed for the purpose. Dr. Harnack's maps are invaluable, and add immensely to the interest of his work. He has succeeded in putting more color and life into many of his descriptions of the spread of the new religion, but he has not succeeded in finding many fresh places where Christianity existed as an organised religion prior to the time of Constantine. In the new edition the excursus on the alleged Council of Antioch has been omitted. It has been replaced by an additional introductory chapter on the results of the Mission of St. Paul and of the first Christian missionaries. The effect of this missionary enterprise was to make Ephesus and Rome, instead of Jerusalem and Antioch, the great centres of the Christian faith. At the opening of the period described by Professor Harnack the soul of the religion was its missionaries; at the end of the third century there was probably hardly any regular missionary at work. The place of the missionary was taken by the church—a new and powerful institution with an impressive cultus, with priests and sacraments of its own, and with a system of doctrine and a philosophy of religion capable of competing successfully with any rivals which might come on to the field. Dr. Harnack's volumes are a fascinating and illuminating study, and will hold their own for many a day as the best exposition of the growth of Christianity in the earlier stages of its existence.

* * *

Of quite exceptional interest is the re-publication in cheap form of the "Letters from an American Farmer" (Chatto & Windus, 6s. net), by J. Hector St. John Crèvecoeur, with a preface by Mr. W. P. Trent, and an introduction by Mr. Ludwig Lewisohn. This work of Crèvecoeur's is reckoned among the classics of American literature, if not of the world; and it is the American representative of that great literary movement towards naturalism that, towards the close of the eighteenth century, expressed itself in Rousseau's "Confessions," and other famous European writings. As a poet-naturalist Crèvecoeur is both unique and distinguished. Hazlitt, reviewing the book some few years after it made its appearance in London, in 1782, wrote that it gave not only the objects but the feelings of a new country. Furthermore, the poetic fancy which clothes this study of American life and manners with a rich idealism is of the kind that gives vividness to, and does not distort, the material truth. Crèvecoeur's imagination was not as literal or as direct as, say, that of Richard Jefferies. The American farmer the former describes would probably have been hard to find in Pennsylvania or the other provinces. But he may rightly be regarded as the type who might have been, had the Americans fulfilled the destiny the author once saw in front of them, and developed as "a people of cultivators." The book is, to this extent, idealistic in its naturalism. Yet the naturalism, where it directly concerns itself with the day-to-day life of the farmer, is singularly pure. Crèvecoeur, through all the vicissitudes of a life spent amid revolutions in France and America, for ever retained the power to wonder at the little marvels of nature. His bees, his pigeons, the common flora and fauna on his farm, filled him with delight, and conveyed to him a symbolism that has its counterpart in the most modern school of nature students. His statements on slavery may, as Mr. Lewisohn suggests, have been unsound; but they were quite in accord with his large grip of the world's elemental realities, and the sanity of them, even if violently expressed, is borne out by the universal verdict of a later day. The letters are inspiriting throughout, from the quaintly diffident apologia for their existence to the concluding "Distresses of a Frontier Man"; the latter, with all its note of tragedy, suggesting nothing more strongly than the optimism which was the distinguishing characteristic of the author's simple and refreshing outlook on life.

* * *

Mr. William Pierce's "An Historical Introduction to the Marprelate Tracts" (Constable, 10s. 6d. net) is a work of great industry and solid value. The authorship of the famous tracts is one of the most interesting problems in English ecclesiastical history and one of the most difficult. Mr. Pierce has brought forward much fresh evidence, but he stops short of a definite statement that Throkmorton was the anonymous satirist, though the circumstantial evidence pointing in this direction is now almost conclusive. One thing that strikes the reader of this controversy is the boisterous humor of the Elizabethan public, which split its sides over these pamphlets, and passed them from hand to hand, in spite of the most frantic efforts on the part of the offended bishops and of the Government. The first tract appeared in the autumn of 1588, the seventh and last in August, 1589, and though the whole country was filled with the controversy, Martin Marprelate was never dragged into the light of day. As specimens of theological invective, they take high rank, but they are also of great historical value for the light they throw upon the origins of English Nonconformity. Mr. Pierce hints, in his preface, at a critical edition of the tracts themselves. Such a work would be heartily welcomed by every student of ecclesiastical history, and Mr. Pierce's "Introduction" shows how well fitted he is for the task. He describes the state of religious life in England at the time the controversy opens, and examines the many intricate problems involved, with a freshness and mastery that evidence an intimate acquaintance with the whole subject. He writes from the Nonconformist standpoint, and, to some extent, his historical views are colored by his sympathy with the men who wished to make the Reformation a breach with episcopacy as well as Papacy. But the general tone of his book is fair and impartial. We heartily congratulate him on this contribution to the history of religious life—unhappily we must also add strife—in England.

* * *

The story of a great Virginian, and, incidentally, an account of the American Civil War, is given in Mr. Thomas Nelson Page's "General Lee: Man and Soldier" (T. Werner Laurie, 5s. net). Lee was in command of the army of Northern Virginia, and was chiefly instrumental in delaying the final triumph of General Grant; this by means of clever manœuvring in face of a force enormously superior in numbers and equipment. Perhaps the purely defensive tactics, to which Lee was restricted in the closing days of the war, account for his being reckoned as a captain great in defence, but lacking the initiative and daring of a first-class military leader; at any rate, it is Mr. Page's object to remove this conception, as unfair to Lee's memory, and his spirited narrative of the battles round Richmond and elsewhere does this effectually enough. Lee's misfortunes were those of the Confederacy with whose cause he identified himself. From beginning to end he was hampered by want of troops and supplies, and, whenever he fought, it was against a force superior in these respects. It was, moreover, his great ill-luck to lose "Stonewall Jackson," the ablest of his lieutenants, at Chancellorsville, and to be left with Longstreet, whose failure to obey orders at Gettysburg was mainly responsible for the defeat of the Confederates. After that battle Grant's policy of "attrition" was assured of success, and all that Lee could do, with his battered and ill-supplied remnant of an army, was to keep the enemy at bay. When subsequently Lee became President of Washington College, he filled a position to which his knowledge of men and his kindly and humane disposition well suited him.

* * *

It is doubtful whether the subject of Miss Elizabeth Godfrey's memoir, "A Sister of Prince Rupert: Elizabeth Princess Palatine and Abbess of Herford" (Lane, 12s. 6d. net), is of sufficient importance to justify so extended a biography. But in these days biography is all the rage, and minor historical characters have to serve for lack of more interesting material. Not that Princess Elizabeth's life is without interest. The niece of Charles I., and the daughter of the luckless King and Queen of Bohemia, she lived in a time of great upheavals, in which her large group of brothers and sisters played a part. She is, of course, overshadowed by the romantic figure of her brother, Prince Rupert, whose name appears in the title of Miss Godfrey's book, but who enters far too little into her pages. Princess Elizabeth's early life was spent at The Hague, where her father and mother lived in penurious exile, often dining

SOME R.T.S. BOOKS.

The 400th Anniversary of the Birth of Calvin. Just Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

John Calvin: The Man and His Work

By the REV. C. H. IRWIN, M.A. With Portraits and numerous other Illustrations.

The Times says: "Mr. Irwin tells his story tersely and instructively."
The Daily Chronicle says: "Mr. Irwin's 'Calvin' is popular in style and well informed in all its facts."
The Glasgow Herald says: "It is a handy, simple, and well-indexed account of the Reformer, his system, and his general influence."
Dr. Alexander Whyte says: "This is a compact, popular, and every way capital life."
The British Weekly says: "It is an admirable short biography."

A fascinating book after the style of "The Chronicles of the Schonberg-Cotta Family."

The Last Days of John Hus.

A HISTORICAL ROMANCE. Translated from the Original Czech. With an Introduction by W. R. MORFILL, Professor of Slavonic Languages in the University of Oxford. With 24 Illustrations by the eminent painter, JAN DEDINA. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

This book is illustrated by pictures of remarkable interest. Never before has such a graphic account of the Council of Constance, and the trial, condemnation, and death of Hus been given to English readers.

"In Remembrance of Me."

AN ANSWER TO THE EUCHARISTIC CONGRESS OF SEPTEMBER, 1908. By the REV. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A. F'cap 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s.

Contents—(1) "The Real Presence"; (2) "The Nature of the Gift"; (3) "Faith Indispensable"; (4) "Is the Lord's Table an Altar?"

Everyone interested in Church Life should read this Charming Book.

New Popular Edition. Crown 8vo, 288 pages. In Cloth.

St. Jude's,

By IAN MACLAREN, Author of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," Etc. With a Frontispiece by HAROLD COPPING. Price 1s. net.

The British Weekly says: "In literary power 'St. Jude's' is equal to the best of Dr. Watson's writings."
The Scots Review says: "Without violating the confessional, Ian Maclaran will, in this merry book, manage to entertain his large circle of admirers with a handsome share of its humours and caprices."

James Gilmour of Mongolia.

HIS DIARIES, LETTERS, AND REPORTS. Edited and Arranged by RICHARD LOVETT, M.A. New and Improved Edition. With 3 Coloured and several other Illustrations. ("Great Men Series," No. 5). Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

The Temple: Its Ministry and Services in the Time of Christ.

By the REV. DR. ALFRED EDERSHEIM. New Cheap Edition. Large crown 8vo, in attractive binding, cloth, 2s.

The Athenæum says: "The author knows the varied topics he discusses better than most scholars in England. There are few who will not learn from a volume which has the results with little of the show of learning."

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
4, BOUVERIE STREET, and 65, ST. PAUL'S, LONDON, E.C.

PLAYS BY JOHN GALSWORTHY.

STRIFE.
THE SILVER BOX.
JOY.

PLAYS BY JOHN GALSWORTHY.

1 Vol. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A NEW VOLUME.

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

FAITH.

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"One realises that this author stands out from among his fellows, since Stevenson died, as the embodiment of one thing in literature . . . that rare thing, charm. . . . Full of pleasing whimsicality, of literary distinction, of quaint, ironical philosophy . . . for all readers who can appreciate literary grace and ironical humour."—ATHENÆUM.

SOUTH AMERICAN SKETCHES.

By W. H. HUDSON. A Re-issue of a Volume hitherto published under the title of "El Ombu." Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net.

GREAT ACTORS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

By CARL MANTZIUS. Being Vol. V. of "A History of Theatrical Art." With 73 Illustrations, royal 8vo, 10s. net.

An Important Text-Book.—Just Published.

THE SCIENTIFIC FEEDING OF ANIMALS.

By O. KELLNER. Translated by W. GOODWIN, B.Sc., Ph.D. 404 pages, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

Prospectus can be had.

GREAT MASTERS OF DUTCH AND FLEMISH PAINTING.

By Dr. W. BODE, 39 Plates, pott 4to, ix-358 pages, 7s. 6d. net.

Write for Prospectus of this important work.

THE COUNTRY MONTH BY MONTH.

By J. A. OWEN and Prof. G. S. BOULGER. A New Edition. With Notes by the late LORD LILFORD. 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 6s. net. [Shortly

MEMOIRS OF A SURREY LABOURER.

By GEORGE BOURNE. New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [March 26th

THE INFAMOUS JOHN FRIEND.

A novel by MRS. R. S. GARNETT. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Shortly

A Novel for a Large Public.

Miss Rosamond Napier's first work is being daily praised by the Press. Not for a long time has a first novel received such genuine tributes of approval from the leading critical journals. It is a novel that engages attention, and is entirely pleasant and wholesome.

THE HEART OF A GYPSY.

A ROMANTIC TALE OF EXMOOR.

By ROSAMOND NAPIER.

Crown 8vo, 360 pages, 6s.

For all those to whom Sun, Wind, Rain, and the Scent of the Earth mean much.

"A touching and human story."—Times.
"This clever and thoughtful book."—Academy.
"Imaginative and original work."—Observer.
"Has all the colour and atmosphere of elfland, poetic and mystic imagination."—Morning Post.
"A romance possessed of vitality, charm, and personality. A living and poignant piece of work.—Outlook.

DUCKWORTH & CO., COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

"on pearls and diamonds," as one of her sisters jestingly put it. She became the friend and disciple of Descartes, with whom she carried on a correspondence that reminds one a little of Sophie Charlotte's literary and philosophical engagements. But Elizabeth was no Sophie Charlotte. She was learned, pious, and amiable, but not distinguished for humor or vivacity. In her later years she was attracted by the Quakers, and, as far as she could, became their protectress. She corresponded with Barclay and Penn, and, appropriately enough, died abbess of a Protestant convent. Miss Godfrey's book will not please serious students; she fails to give a clear-cut impression of the complex political movements of the age, and her method of handling such topics as the Cartesian philosophy is superficial. The general reader, however, who does not want philosophical analysis or historical research, will find nothing to complain of in the book.

* * *

Books about our English churches have been plentiful of late, and, since there are but few of them that have omitted to include some reference to the architectural principles underlying church construction, it cannot be said that the purely architectural aspect of this subject has been neglected. Nevertheless, Mr. G. A. T. Middleton's "English Church Architecture" (Francis Griffiths, 2s. 6d. net), is in no way superfluous, and it will be found a useful cicerone by the many who have neither the time nor the patience to disentangle architecture from history in the more ambitious kind of volume. This manual, which sets forth to trace the development of our church architecture from the earliest times to the Reformation in little more than a hundred pages, is necessarily slight, but its judicious handling of technical terms and its general lucidity in arrangement are quite admirable. Church architecture in this country cannot be traced much further back than the days of St. Augustine, and there is not a great deal extant that can be attributed to the pre-Norman period, but what there is is dealt with in a first chapter. Then the Norman, the development of the Norman into the miscalled Early English, thence into the Decorated, and, finally, its efflorescence into the Perpendicular, are briefly sketched. A good deal of attention is paid to the growth of the pointed arch, that marked the end of the Norman period. Vaulting and tracery, as these gained enrichment at the hands of English craftsmen, are the subjects of later chapters, and the evolution of the window from the lancet form is traced succinctly, and is accompanied by interesting drawings. In both text and illustrations, the book is practical and suggestive.

Insurance.

A REVOLUTION IN FIRE PROTECTION.

Here, in England, we are slow in learning lessons of our neighbors, and have an insular preference for avoiding them altogether. Our cousins across the water are far more receptive, and hence it is that most of the new methods in machinery and engineering come from America. Conservatism there, if it have any abiding place in the United States, is more open minded and prepared to expect that the future must yield fresh-born ideas which will mature into better results, year upon year, than our ordinary business mind, which clings to the "let be" and the "let well alone," will admit. Movement is the very essence of progress, and all our care should be to steer it in the right direction. In the important matter of fire protection we have already been given some lessons from America, and, although these have induced vast improvements in the system, yet it has been demonstrated, by constant experience, that the unexpected has set our best schemes at naught.

It will probably be a decade before we in England take up the parable taught us in 1901 by the little mining camp of Nome, on the shore of Behring Sea. The necessity of their surroundings, where their houses, and even streets, were built upon piles, and where the dry heat of summer might at any time, with a fire well started, quickly convert Nome into the "no more," made their people look askance at any ordinary fire-engine. They regarded, with natural apprehension, the possibility that the getting of the engine along the burning streets to the seat of the fire might present insuperable difficulties, which might even yet involve failure to connect the engine with any adequate source of water supply. In view of the wise tradition that "the first five minutes of a fire and its treatment during the time determine its extent," the Nomeites devised a scheme of their own which has had, and will have, an immense bearing upon the general subject of fire protection. Their method was simple, as are, indeed, all the best and most lasting inventions. They installed lines of hose, served by hydrants, along their streets, and preferred a high-pressure water supply from fixed pumping stations rather than rely upon their "portable pumping station," as they styled their fire-engine, which, upon technical advice, they had anchored upon their apology for a pier. They could consistently argue that if their engine could not readily traverse their rickety streets, the brigade men could, and that at any spot they would find means at hand for them at once to work upon. In further advocacy of the high-pressure system, it might be added that the chief hindrance to the operations of a fire brigade is smoke, not so much from the fire as from the engines themselves. The engines are, it must be remembered, on the ground, and the volumes of smoke which they emit must, in any case, hinder the sight of the operators, whilst it is more probable that the fire is on the upper floors, and the smoke is comparatively unimportant. Under the high-pressure system there is no smoke save from the fire itself, and, therefore, in most cases the earliest and most important attack can be properly located and the first stages mastered. In considering the further advantages of the new system, it is pointed out that the supersession of the fire-engine means lighter and clearer streets. Hose wagons will alone be required, and these can be brought to the fire with comparative ease and less danger to the service and man in the street.

New York City, although equipped with a brigade of over four thousand men, organised as 161 engine companies, sixty-six hook and ladder companies, seven hose companies, and five water-tower companies, has not been too proud to follow the humble lead of the miners of Nome. Though New York cannot complain of any lack of efficiency in its machinery and organisation, it has yielded to the suggestion of plain common sense. It has recognised that "water in any required volume, and at the necessary pressure, is available for instant service by the mere attachment of hose to the present hydrants, and the amount of water that may be at once poured on the flames is limited only by the available supply of hose, and the few seconds required for its attachment is the only element of time involved." The high-pressure system has two branches of service, which are the method of distribution and the pumping stations. The distribution comprises fifty-six miles of mains, with 1,274 hydrants, 2,191 valves, or four at every intersection, for sending the course of water in any direction where an excess of normal may be required, and the entire installation is independent of the ordinary city water supply, except its connection through the pumping stations. The pumping stations pump the water from the mains or river, forcing it into the mains of the distributing system, where it circulates under pressure, and whence it is delivered from the hydrant nozzles for fire purposes. The New York Edison Company, which has six separate generating electric power and distributing stations in the city, has contracted for the current for operating the pumps. Each pump is capable of furnishing 3,100 gallons per minute, and the requisite pressure must be available for use within three minutes after an alarm is given, under a penalty of £100 per minute for failure.

The high-pressure system has been six months in operation in New York, and it is stated to have brought peace of mind to the merchants and insurance companies in that city, for it is stated that "a conflagration would absolutely bankrupt every large fire insurance company doing business in the United States." Wake up, London!

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER,"

will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

The Daily News

is now printed simultaneously in London and Manchester.

This means that Liberals all England over are able to get the representative Liberal organ every morning at the same time as their local daily.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

London Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.

Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

MISCELLANEOUS.

OLD-FASHIONED COTTAGE surrounded by good garden. Six rooms, good kitchen and range, and large outbuilding. Dry and convenient. Not overlooked. Tradesmen's entrance. Old-world, unspoilt part of Essex. Station about hour from City. Good service of tradesmen and postal facilities. £25 to good tenant.—P.

COATS OF ARMS and PEDIGREES.—The Author of "A List of Emigrant Ministers to America" will send free to any interested a circular on the legal right to arms.—GERALD FOTHERGILL, 11, Brussels-road, New Wandsworth.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

THIS IS THE TIME OF YEAR WHEN

Liver troubles

ARE MORE PREVALENT.

If the Liver is weak, the change from Summer to Autumn, renders it incapable of performing its duties, and the result is, an accumulation of bile in the blood which causes depression, irritability, and may develop into Dropsy.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets

STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

will quickly and positively cure all Liver disorders. When the valuable curative and tonic properties they contain, are absorbed into the system, the circulation carries them direct to the Liver, where they stimulate this organ to perform its duties naturally, and strengthen it to maintain health action. MERIT'S LIVERETS are prepared as prescribed by an eminent Physician, from purely vegetable ingredients. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists and Stores, or if unable to obtain, send direct to

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name "MERIT'S LIVERETS," and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Spurious imitations will not cure you.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, March 12.	Price Friday morning, March 19.
Consols 2½ per cent.	84 1/16	83 11/16
German 3 per cent.	86	85½
Russian Fours	98⅛	97¼
Peru Pref.	34	33¾

The Stock Exchange has been having rather a bad time this week. First of all there has been the dangerous situation in the Near East, then President Taft's urgent call to Congress for revenue in view of a 100 million dollar deficit, and, finally, the naval debate in the House of Commons, with the sensational and alarming construction that seemed to be put upon the German programme by both the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that home and foreign Government loans of all descriptions suffered, and that markets generally fell away. Indeed, whether the preparations in Germany and Great Britain are warlike or not, they are quite costly enough to account for a further shrinkage of national credit. Mr. Balfour plainly indicated that he would resort again to loans for works. And, although this Government does not fall to dishonest finance of that kind, everyone expects that Mr. Lloyd George will raid the Sinking Fund. Next year, of course, both here and in Germany, the situation will be much worse. France is also badly embarrassed for revenue Brazil is up to its eyes in new loans. Japan is very hard up. Russia is seemingly on the road to ruin. Austria is borrowing heavily, and may have to go to war. Turkish finance is in chaos. Italy and Spain are both again on the down grade, and Portugal seems to be on the verge of a composition. In South and Central America trouble seems to be boiling up, and there is a good deal of anxiety about investments in Mexico. The heavy fall in Peruvian Corporations has been due not so much to the recent figures as to fears about the friction between Chili, Bolivia, and Peru over the Arica and La Paz Railway. But prices have recovered on French buying.

Armament Companies' Results.

Two important amament companies' reports published this week indicate an extraordinary depression in the steel business. Cammell, Laird & Co. have a "trading profit for the year" of £42,000, but from this has to be deducted £103,000 for interest, £91,000 for losses on contracts, and £17,000 for the debit balance brought forward; so that the net result is an adverse balance of £169,000. Apart from the general depression, the company has had to face peculiar difficulties in connection with its Government contracts and the irregularities practised a year ago by its employees. It will be remembred that towards the end of 1907 Cammell Laird were struck off the list of the Government's contractors and so lost the custom not merely of the Admiralty, but of the War Office, the India Office, and other departments. A year ago they were replaced, but their credit has not yet recovered from the shock, and, as the report says, the prosperity of the company has been seriously affected, and the turnover reduced by one-third, while fixed charges have remained stationary. Last year the directors, by way of meeting the losses incurred through the "irregularities," wrote off £63,900 from the profit and loss account, and estimated the remaining loss at £77,000. The loss, in fact, proved a good deal heavier—£91,000 of this sum has been debited to profit and loss this year. It may be hoped that the unfortunate episode is now ended. Nothing has been written off for depreciation, and no preference dividend has been paid, so that the £5 cumulative preference shares are now carrying 12½ per cent. dividend. They fell as the directors' announcement, and are now quoted at 3⅝. Vickers, Sons & Maxim, the other armament company whose report has just been published, has net profits of £416,800, against £768,000 a year ago—a large decline, but less important than it looks owing to an increase in the debenture interest by nearly £50,000 since last year. But when every allowance has been made, the twelve months are certainly the worst period that the company has known for a long time. The dividend is reduced from 15 to 10 per cent., and the price of the £1 ordinary shares is 37s. 6d., against £39s. 3d. at this time last year. The highest price in 1908 was 41s. 6d. and the lowest 32s. 9d.

Business in the United States.

Business men and investors are naturally watching the United States very closely just now. The depression came from New York, and it is perhaps from New York that the revival should be expected. But authorities in the States do not strike a cheerful note. The general business of the country, observes the "Wall Street Journal," only improves very slowly where it improves at all. Some lines are doing well, but intense dulness prevails in the more important departments. The textile business is, upon the whole, one of the most encouraging features. People must be clothed, even if they are much more economical in expenditures in dull times than they are when wages are high and general business is booming. It must be remembered that in 1908 the retailers almost to a man allowed their stocks to dwindle down to the lowest possible point. Evidently they are now returning to something of their more usual methods, and, while they are not stocking so lavishly as they did two years ago, they are recognising that there is an irreducible minimum of business for them in good times and bad. Our New York contemporary adds:—

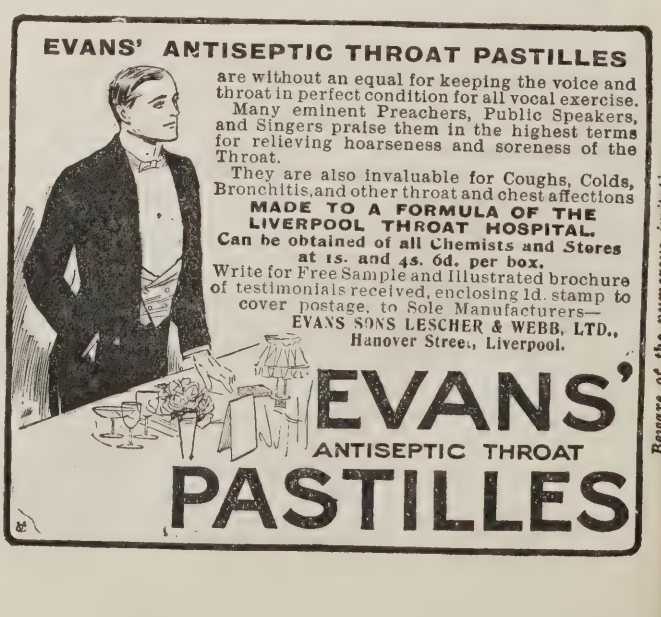
> "It is astonishing how many things people can dispense with when they have not the means to pay for them, but this fact seems a source of perennial surprise at the beginning of those periods of dulness which follow a great crisis like that of 1907. The dullness of necessaries at present shows this very clearly, and it is still more apparent in the matter of luxuries. The theatre business in New York, for instance, is doing badly. One of the infallible signs of this is that outbreak of exhibitions of a doubtful character, widely advertised in the hope of attracting patrons by something more than sober merit. We are not less moral than we were, but what has happened is that business is bad and unscrupulous purveyors of entertainment adopt any means to stimulate it."

The new tariff in its first shape may help our boot and leather trades, our cotton trade, our steel trade, and our exports of carpets. Judge Taft's efforts will be towards reducing it further; but the Senate is a doubtful factor.

A Young Insurance Co.

The Legal Insurance Co., which was formed last year to take over the Profits and Income Insurance Co., has recently issued its first report and held its first meeting. Its Board is composed entirely of lawyers and mainly of solicitors, and, as a connection with the law always seems to be a help to an insurance company, there is no reason why the venture should not succeed. Last year the net premiums amounted to £26,716, and the claims paid and outstanding to £8,667. Commissions and expenses absorbed £8,856, and the revenue balance was £15,629. Of this £5,589 is applied in writing off organisation expenses, and £10,040 carried to the next account.

Lucellum.



EVANS' ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES
are without an equal for keeping the voice and throat in perfect condition for all vocal exercise.
Many eminent Preachers, Public Speakers, and Singers praise them in the highest terms for relieving hoarseness and soreness of the Throat.
They are also invaluable for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, and other throat and chest affections
MADE TO A FORMULA OF THE LIVERPOOL THROAT HOSPITAL.
Can be obtained of all Chemists and Stores at 1s. and 4s. 6d. per box.
Write for Free Sample and Illustrated brochure of testimonials received, enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage, to Sole Manufacturers—
EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB, LTD.,
Hanover Street, Liverpool.
EVANS'
ANTISEPTIC THROAT
PASTILLES
Ask for "Evans'" Pastilles and see you get them.
Beware of the numerous imitations.

THE LEGAL
Insurance Company, LTD.

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell,
The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane,
The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Chairman - J. FIELD BEALE, Solicitor.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion.

Write for particulars. HENRY M. LOW, General Manager.

TOURS.

The R.M.S. DUNOTTAR CASTLE (of the Union-Castle Line) is chartered for a series of cruises as follows :—

£21 0s. 0d. ATHENS, TUNIS, CARTHAGE, MALTA, THE GREEK ISLES, April 8th.

£14 14s. 0d. PALERMO, TUNIS, ALGIERS, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, LISBON, April 28th.

Full particulars from Dr. H. S. LUNN, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book
All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

RISK OF FIRE.

MAPLE AND CO.

would impress upon Householders the importance of having their Furniture and effects adequately covered by Insurance, and being in a position to prove the existence and value of furniture to the satisfaction of the Insurance Companies. It is not generally known that in the event of loss by fire the Companies require a complete list of the effects destroyed, together with the SEPARATE VALUE OF EACH ARTICLE. MAPLE AND CO. ADVISE HOUSEHOLDERS TO POSSESS A DESCRIPTIVE INVENTORY AND VALUATION of their FURNITURE and effects, with a PRICE AGAINST EACH PARTICULAR ITEM, for evidence in the event of a fire or loss by burglary. Further than this, Maple and Co. can arrange for indisputable policies on Furniture, Pictures, China, and Articles of Vertu, whereby, in the event of loss by either fire or burglary, the FULL VALUE OF THE EFFECTS DESTROYED MAY BE RECOVERED without question, delay, or the intervention of an arbitrator.

MAPLE AND CO.

have a special department for carrying out these valuations on very moderate terms, and full particulars and advice will be given free on application at their Offices, Tottenham Court Road, London, W.

TANGYE
OIL ENGINE
AUTOMATIC
TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

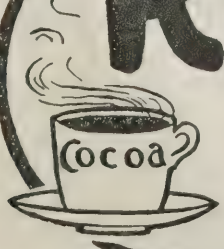
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES I., II. & III. OF THE NATION

May be had free on application to the Manager.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING.

Rowntree's



Just the drink for breakfast and supper— try it! it

"Warms and Cheers"

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb. Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.
Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.
A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.
A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.
SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN MARCH.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.
Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.
THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.
Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.
Preparation for London Matriculation, 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.
In the South of Cheshir four miles from Crewe. Opened 1900. Modern Buildings with 24 acres of grounds. A Preparatory School in immediate connection with the Present School will be opened in May. Next Entrance Examination for both Schools, April 2nd, at the School. Application should be made to the HEADMASTER, or to the CLERK TO THE GOVERNORS, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT
(THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL).
Entrance Scholarship Examination, March 24th and following days. Apply Headmaster, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

EDUCATIONAL.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.
SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.
Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13. Waltershauser Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.
THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.
Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.
House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.
Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.
Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.
Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.
ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.
Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations 30 minutes from London.
Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.
Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.
Nice—Galignani's Library.
Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.
Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.
Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh
STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor
MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager
ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station
NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment
ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647
HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for
HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE EUSTON
Close to King's Cross and St. Pancras Stations.
THE UNIVERSITY
HOTEL
ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, Gordon Square
LONDON

Close proximity to Tube Station for all parts of London. Beautifully Furnished by MAPLE. Comforts and Food Equal to anywhere in London, but prices strictly moderate Sanitation perfect. Fireproof Floors. Lifts, Baths every floor. Lounge, Billiards. Spacious Dining Room. Write Manager for illustrated Tariff Booklet.

BEDROOM inclusive of Breakfast, Lights, and attendance, from 5/-

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.
THACKERAY HOTEL
Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.
KINGSLEY HOTEL
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.
Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.
BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.
Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.
FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.
Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day
PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.
NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate
SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager
ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day
HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.
MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

A WORK OF THE MOST VITAL INTEREST.
MORE FASCINATING THAN ANY NOVEL.

ROYAL LOVERS & MISTRESSES.

The Romance of crowned and uncrowned Kings and Queens of Europe.

By Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT, Author of "The Curse of the Romanoffs," &c.

Illustrated, demy 8vo, cloth, 16s. net.

GREENING'S SPRING FICTION.

A FEW PRESS OPINIONS.

MAY WYNNE'S "HENRY OF NAVARRE." 5/-

The Story of Wm. Devereux's successful Play at the New Theatre. Sixth Edition. Illustrated by H. M. Brock.

"Miss Wynne has written a vivid story, which improves as it goes along."—Evening Standard.

HOUGHTON TOWNLEY'S "SIN OF THE DUCHESS." 6/-

"Reveals the author as one of the best of our imaginative writers."—Newcastle Journal.

CAPT. HENRY CURTIES'S "OUT OF THE SHADOWS." 6/-

"Those who love mystery and excitement will be pleased."—Birmingham Gazette.

CYRUS BRADY'S "LITTLE FRANCE." 6/-

"Wholehearted love of adventure and heroism which rattles through the book from cover to cover."—Daily Telegraph.

GERALD BISS'S "BRANDED." 6/-

(SECOND EDITION.)

"Mr. Biss is making a genuine reputation as a writer of clean, wholesome, and stimulating sensational stories."—Standard.

NOW READY.

GURNER GILLMAN'S Latest Novel "ONLY APRIL." 6/-

JOHN K. LEYS'S Latest Novel "UNDERGROUND." 6/-

A BREEZY AND UNCONVENTIONAL WORK,

Mrs. PENROSE'S PHILOSOPHER.

By HAROLD SIMPSON. 6s.

This book will appeal to all lovers of sound, healthy fiction. It is a charming love story, charmingly told. It is healthy without being affected. The author has grace and delicacy of touch. He can deal with nature without either botanising or being blatant. The people of whom he writes are real. They convince us. The Philosopher is a delightful character, and so is Mrs. Penrose—the woman who seemed to "change her moods as easily as her clothes." The book has truth, passion, and power, and there are no better things than these in fiction.

A MILLION A MINUTE.

A MAID OF HONOUR.

By ROBERT AITKEN, Author of "The Golden Horseshoe." 6s.

The author may be enrolled on the list of this century's group of young writers who are rapidly pushing their way to the front. Mr. Aitken's last romance, "The Golden Horseshoe," was extraordinarily successful both in this country and America, and the publishers confidently assure readers of "A Maid of Honour" that (though the phrase is hackneyed) they will not lay the book down until the last page is reached if they wish to learn how a fortune may be lost or won at the rate of "a million a minute."

Patcola

A Tale of a Dead City.
By ENA FITZGERALD. 6s.

The author has spread over her pages the wonderful glamour of the Hindustan of the past—a notable achievement at the hands of a girl not yet eighteen years of age.

NEW VOLUME IN THE LOTUS LIBRARY.

THE MATAPAN JEWELS

By FORTUNE DU BOISGOBEY. Translated by G. P. MONKSHOOD.

Price 1s. 6d. net, cloth; 2s. net, leather.

 Ask your Bookseller for a Complete Series of the above, which includes works by such writers as ANATOLE FRANCE, DAUDET, FLAUBERT, DE MAUPASSANT, BOURGET, DE MUSSET, and other great writers.

RECENT ADDITIONS TO GREENING'S SHILLING SERIES.

BEAU BROCADE, Baroness ORCZY. A MAID IN BRITTANY, MAY WYNNE. MAYFAIR, WINIFRED GRAHAM.

The above popular series are done up in strong red cloth, with attractive wrapper. One Shilling Net.

READY IMMEDIATELY.

A New Novel by the Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

THE OLD MAN IN THE CORNER.

By BARONESS ORCZY. 6s.

GREENING AND CO., LTD., 91, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. IV., No. 26.] SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1909. [Price 6d
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

Diary of the Week 949

Politics and Affairs:—
From Panic to Reason 952
The Truth about German Ship-building 953
The Motives of German Policy 955
The Hope of a Revival of Trade 956

Life and Letters:—
The Psychology of a Panic ... 957
The Twin Stars of Poetry ... 958
The Furious Century 959

Short Studies:—
The Little Pension. By Padraic Colum 961

Present-day Problems:—
Aeroplanes at Olympia. By Douglas Leechman 963

Letters from Abroad:—
Clearing the Air. By Ed. Bernstein 964

Communications:—
The Treasury and the Army and Navy Estimates. By Reformer 964

Letters to the Editor:—
Anatole France and Joan of Arc. By Andrew Lang ... 965
Imperialism and Militarism. By Frederic Harrison... ... 966
The War Danger. By the Rev. R. L. Gales 966
The Passion for Material Security. By the Rev. John D. Sinclair 966
"The Logic of Woman's Suffrage." By Clementina Black and F. Melian Stawell 967

PAGE

The Reform of the Death Duties. By Sydney P. Turnbull 967
The Profits and Income Insurance Company. By Alex. D. Auchterlonie and John Lewis 968
Mr. Hocking and the Roman Catholic Church. By the Rev. Joseph Hocking 968
A Doubt about the "Sermon in Stones." By J. Graham Murray 963
The Mortality of Chinese Opium Smokers. By the Rev. Thomas G. Selby 963
On Running Down the English. By Shipowner 969
London University Commission. By R. Spindler 968
The Eton Hare Hunt. By Henry S. Salt 969

Poetry:—
Milton Agonistes. By Professor C. H. Herford 969

The World of Books 970
Books to be Read 970

Reviews:—
The Secret of the Sangraal. By A. M. 971
The Baghdad Railway 972
Romanticism and its Critics ... 973
The Carlyle Love-Story ... 976
Half and Half 976

Books in Brief:—
The Bible of Nature 978
European Travellers in India ... 978

The Week in the City. By Lucellum 980

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The domestic side of the Navy scare has taken an entirely new aspect. On Friday week the head of the Tory Party, obeying, as usual, the pressure from the tail, gave notice of a vote of censure declaring that the Government's policy in regard to the provision of "Dreadnoughts" did not "sufficiently secure the safety of the Empire." Mr. Balfour's inept manœuvre not only brought the whole Ministerial party into line, but vitally affected the tone of Ministerial speeches. When Mr. Asquith offered a date, and proposed last Thursday, Mr. Balfour, mindful, it would seem, of the Croydon election, drew back, and asked for a postponement. Mr. Asquith politely suggested the 1st of April, Mr. Balfour retorting angrily that that would be an appropriate day if the subject of discussion were merely a question of folly, or of something worse than folly—a proper description of the two sides of his frivolous and now clearly partisan tactics in regard to the Navy.

* * *

Ultimately Monday was fixed, but during the week the disapproval of serious and moderate Unionist statesmanship was made manifest, and timid feelers have been put forward in the "Times" and elsewhere to secure the withdrawal of the vote or to avoid a division upon it on the basis of a Government promise to make the conditional "Dreadnoughts" absolute. This purpose is aimed at by a small organised band of Liberal Imperialists in the House. But it would, of course, break up the policy and violate the agreement already arrived at by the Cabinet. The motion, as well as the scare, will attain their desired ends of influencing the Croydon election, and will then begin to be forgotten. Mr. Balfour's management of his speakers for Monday has been most unfortunate. Mr. Lee, who has twice publicly insulted Germany, and is at no time a politician of weight, is to move the resolution, and Mr. Balfour reserves himself for the winding-up of the debate. This is striking evidence of the Parliamentary weakness of the Opposition.

* * *

Meanwhile, the attack of the Opposition changed the current of the debate. By far the best contribution to it was made on Monday by Sir Charles Dilke, who, though a consistent "big Navy" statesman, spoke strongly against the panic and declared it to be groundless. He thought that we had at this moment a greater naval preponderance than at any other period of our history, that the German fleet was at present "utterly unimportant" in comparison with our own, and that nothing new had lately been disclosed beyond the fact that Germany had overcome her earlier difficulties as to turrets and gun-mountings. He mentioned one important point, which is disputed, that the Powers had agreed, as a result of the Hague Conference, to communicate their programmes to one another as far as possible—a direction in which we hope that progress with Germany will be made. Finally, he strongly approved the Government's plan of pausing on their full programme, and meanwhile accepting Germany's assurances that she was not going to exceed the provisions of her Defence Act. No such admirably balanced or statesmanlike speech has as yet been contributed to the discussion.

* * *

The Prime Minister followed mainly in the same track. He stated that "there was no friction, no unfriendliness, no suspicion" between Germany and ourselves, declared the statements of British unpreparedness to be "absurd and mischievous legends," dwelt on the overwhelming superiority and perfect fitness of the pre-"Dreadnought" fleet of 40 battleships and 35 armored cruisers, and appealed to the nation against a continuance of the scare. An admirable speech, but a week late. Mr. McKenna supplemented it with further facts as to our overwhelming preponderance over Germany in destroyers. Thus we have 127 such boats fit to work in the North Sea, whereas Germany has at the outside only 76 or 77. On Thursday Mr. Asquith made a very important admission. He stated that on March 10—before his alarming speech—the German Government had stated the facts as to the early laying down of two ships, and had also said that they could only have 13 "Dreadnoughts" at sea by 1912. The Prime Minister admitted that he had mistaken the purport of this communication. He thought that it excluded cruisers. He now finds that it included them. Clearly, then, by this confession, the figures as to German strength in 1912 presented last week by him and Mr. McKenna were erroneous.

* * *

The panic about the Navy passed from these shores to the Colonies, and produced a touching pledge of affection from the Dominion of New Zealand, the most considerate and faithful of our Colonies. New Zealand has offered to bear the cost of building and arming one, and, if necessary, two, "Dreadnoughts"—an offer equivalent, as the "Manchester Guardian" points out, to a British contribution of 40 "Dreadnoughts." The Government, acknowledging this thrilling act with deep gratitude, have declined the offer for this year, but accepted it for next in case the demand on the national resources requires it. Canadian and Australian agitations have been set on foot with the same object, and it is to be noted that Mr. Deakin, the favorite statesman of Imperialist Protectionists, has discouraged the Australian movement. Australia, of course, aims at a small and virtually independent Navy of her own.

* * *

In estimating the panic on naval affairs, some regard should be had to its extent, and to the character of its chief organs in the public Press. An immediate distinction should be made. The provincial Press, as usual, has distinguished itself by its superior reserve and coolness, and the "Glasgow Herald" has not failed to rebuke not merely the scare, but Mr. Balfour's use of it, not only for party, but for electioneering purposes. Nor did many public men of eminence, or the Mayors of many towns, respond to the "Daily Mail's" successful appeals to such pillars of the State as Archdeacon Sinclair. Still more reassuring is it to examine the chief sources of the scare in the public prints. They come, in the main, from two organisations, whose productions may thus be tabulated:—

"Daily Mail."
"Times."
"Observer."	Harmsworths.
"Evening News."
"Mirror."
"Standard."
"Express."	Pearsons.

If, therefore, the bray of alarm which has resounded through the land is disconcerting to friends and admirers of this country, it is fair to remember that it proceeded largely from one animal, or from two.

* * *

There has been the usual violent swing from optimism to pessimism in the diplomatic world this week with regard to the Austro-Servian crisis. On Sunday it was announced that the Powers, on English initiative, were about to advise Servia to disarm and to declare the Bosnian question closed; as a result Austria delayed replying to the Servian note. A couple of days later the Powers had still made no move, and it appeared that England and Russia were finding it difficult to agree on the formula in which to present their advice to Servia. A day or so later it further appeared that the formula they finally hit on would not suit Austria, and the report went round that Austria would wait no longer, but hasten to reply to the Servian note with practically an ultimatum. The truth seems to be that the Isvolsky-Aehrenthal duel is keeping the wound open a little longer, but that the Powers are hammering away at another formula, and doubtless will do after many days what could have been done in half-an-hour with a genuine good-will. According to the "Manchester Guardian's" Sofia correspondent there is profound dissatisfaction in Bulgaria with the Russo-Turkish agreement, which does not bind Turkey to an immediate acknowledgment of Bulgaria's independence, nor settle the compensation to be paid for the Oriental railway, while it leaves a host of questions as to posts, lighthouses, and religious lands over to be arranged by direct negotiation between Turkey and Bulgaria. Meanwhile one of the worst of European firebrands, the Crown Prince of Servia, has been forced to resign his rights to the throne as a result of the manslaughter of a servant, a scandalous incident in a half-insane career.

* * *

On Wednesday Sir Edward Grey made a speech on Persia in the House of Commons, the greater portion of which was given up to a defence of Russia's loyalty to the Anglo-Russian Agreement. He urged that both the Russian Government and its agents in Persia, including Col. Liakhoff, had kept out of domestic politics since the coup d'état, and that in sending an additional guard to Resht, Russia had done nothing more than was the right of a country whose trade was being damaged, and the lives and property of whose subjects were being imperilled. Sir Edward Grey must have forgotten Col. Liakhoff's notorious speech to the troops leaving for Tabriz, and he ignored the impression shared by the Shah, by the correspondents of many foreign and English papers—not excepting the "Times"—and, we have reason to believe, by our Legation itself, that the Russian Government and it agents are peculiarly favorable to the Shah. He also missed the point made by Mr. Lynch and Mr. Dillon that Russia's shortest way both of ending civil war and anarchy and of demonstrating her impartial desire not to intervene, would be the withdrawal of her officers from the Shah's service. The most satisfactory passage in Sir Edward Grey's speech was his reiteration of his pledge not to lend money to the Shah's Government—"one of the worst governments which any country could have"—without the sanction of a Mejliss, and of his personal preference for absolute non-intervention. As to neither point, however, did he speak for Russia, and he reduced our right to scan Russia's action almost to a shadow.

* * *

In the course of his speech on Persia, Sir Edward Grey made an interesting statement on his diplomatic methods and on the King's European visits. He insisted, in answer to Mr. McNeill, that the King had strictly observed the constitutional practice of acting in foreign affairs only through the Foreign Office, and that his journeys and interviews had the special value of conveying, through the King's tact and bonhomie, a strong impression of the people's "good disposition and good will." He denied that the Anglo-Russian Convention was negotiated at Reval—an important and, of course, truthful statement, which we hope Germany will believe. As to Sir Charles Hardinge's presence, he said he had simply acted as a kind of Ambassadorial reporter to the Foreign Office. But in the Berlin case, a Cabinet Minister had been sent, though he himself remained at home "at the centre of things." We may hope, therefore, that in future the Berlin rather than the Revel procedure will be adhered to.

* * *

Lord Morley has faithfully redeemed the most important of his pledges to the Indian people by appointing a native, Mr. Sinha, the Advocate-General of Bengal and one of the ablest lawyers in India, to be legal member of the Viceroy's Executive Council. The "Times" characteristically suggests that this fulfilment of the Act of 1833, of the Queen's Proclamation of 1858, and of the King's confirming Proclamation of 1908, means the lowering of the "capacities and virtues" of the Government of India. On the other hand, the Liberal Press unanimously approves an appointment greatly strengthening the legal side of Indian government, which is none too strong. Mr. Sinha's qualifications are that he is the best man to be had, and that our rule can only be strengthened by associating one Indian out of 300,000,000 with our supreme organ of Government.

* * *

We have no space this week to deal with the important conclusions of the Naval Conference, which has resulted in the "Declaration of London." This new and important addition to international law defines contraband for the first time, and establishes a Free List, consisting chiefly of raw materials, which cannot be touched so long as they are protected by a neutral flag. Sir Edward Grey's conduct of the British case was beyond praise.

* * *

The week has been rather troublous in Turkey. A couple of battalions of reservists mutinied at Yanina, the people of Smyrna have displayed strong opposition to the nomination of Ferid Pasha, an official of the old régime, as their Vali, and the Arabs round Basra have been restless. The mutiny does not appear to have been the result of reactionary intrigues, but was due to the desire of men to return home who had been kept past their legal time with the colors, and the appointment of Ferid seems to have been owing to the dearth of trained officials untainted with despotic traditions. On the other hand, there are rumors of a breach between Hilmi Pasha, the Premier, and the Committee. Perhaps, however, the most important event of the last few days is the continuation of the negotiations for a truce or common action between the Committee of Union and Progress and the Liberal Union. The Committee stands for centralisation, the Union for ample concessions to the Nationalities. But it is an obvious need of the present to postpone consideration of this complicated problem and unite to settle immediate difficulties.

* * *

On Wednesday Mr. Churchill, in a speech showing great powers of exposition, introduced the Trade Boards Bill, the most advanced scheme of social reconstruction which the Government has as yet brought forward. A minimum wage standard is to be fixed by the machinery of Trade Boards in certain sweated industries where trade unionism cannot be organised—the tailoring trade, the cardboard boxmaking trade, the machine-made lace and net-finishing trade, and the ready-made blouse trade. The names of all these industries recall a long and terrible story of human misery. They are to be regulated as to wage rates both for home and factory workers by Central and District Trade Boards, composed of officials, employers, workmen, and workwomen. Within six months of the date when the Central Board fixes minimum rates for the two classes of workers concerned, they will become obligatory. But first a "white list" of employers who voluntarily agree to them will be published, and only such firms will be eligible for Government contracts. After the six months, steps will be taken for the enforcement by the State of the wage-rates the Board lays down. The Bill, as Mr. Churchill properly said, protects good employers as well as workmen, and aims especially at the formation of a healthy trade opinion. We shall recur to the subject next week.

* * *

The French postal strike ended on Tuesday in the complete victory of the employees. The dislocation of telegraphic and postal traffic had increased greatly during the preceding days, the strike movement was spreading to postal servants in other towns than Paris, and there was danger of a sympathetic strike on the part of other Government employees and railwaymen. Soldiers proved useless as substitutes for the strikers. On Friday a Presidential decree threatened the dismissal of all strikers, but without effect. The Chamber discussed the situation on the same day, and after a sitting, which lasted till one on Saturday morning, passed, by an overwhelming majority, a resolution condemning strikes by functionaries, and urging the Government to restore order.

* * *

The significant episode of the debate was the admission by the Minister for Public Works that the Post Office ought to be directed by a technically expert chief. The strikers were demanding that M. Simyan, the Under-Secretary, should be dismissed, and all the strikers reinstated. On Monday they put these terms before M. Clemenceau, who accepted the second, and gave the employees to understand that at no distant date M. Simyan would be replaced by an expert. On this understanding the strikers returned to work. Their victory has made a very great impression upon public opinion. Conservatives profess to see in it the first triumph of the revolutionary trade unionism, and everyone is compelled to recognise the enormous power which rests in the hands of those workers who control the means of communication, especially if they are highly educated as well as highly skilled. It is worth noting that the bye-elections to the Chamber on Sunday marked a continued forward march of the Socialists.

* * *

The movement for the building and endowment of a National Theatre, with a special obligation to give representations of Shakespeare's plays, has been well started at a Mansion House meeting at which the Lord Mayor, after receiving the report of the Executive Committee, recorded a promised donation of £70,000. The Committee aim at a total fund of £500,000, to be obtained by 1911. Half of this is to go to site and building, half to endowment, at the rate of about £10,000 a year. We strongly hope that the Government or the London County Council or both will relieve the Committee of £100,000 of this sum by providing a site. The scheme will throw out wings to the provinces and the Mayors of the great centres will be asked to form committees and raise funds.

* * *

Lieutenant Shackleton, the head of the Nimrod Antarctic Expedition, has telegraphed to the "Daily Mail" full accounts of the results of his adventures. They appear to have been brilliant, if not extremely valuable. The utmost point reached was within 111 miles of the South Pole, as against Captain Scott's approach to within 500 miles. When the party finally retreated, after planting a flag given them by the Queen, they had in view a vast, high, snow-covered plateau, with no further mountain range in sight. They also reached the South Magnetic Pole, situated on a plateau between 10,000 and 11,000 feet above sea level; ascended and explored the crater and smoke holes of Mount Erebus, the great Antarctic volcano over 13,000 feet high; and discovered new mountain chains and many new peaks. Their journey lasted four months, and covered over 1,700 miles, during which, with the help of ponies and by means of a system of depôts, they struggled over glaciers, crevasses, and snow-fields, through frightful blizzards, and suffered much from dysentery and frost bite. The lowest temperature experienced was 89 degrees of frost.

Politics and Affairs.

FROM PANIC TO REASON.

In a surface sense the naval scare may be expected to end with the Vote of Censure Debate and the Croydon polling. In a deeper sense its effects will remain, and its lesson should be pondered by everyone who considers not merely the honor but the safety of his country. For the moment it was one of the ugliest, as it was certainly one of the most groundless, scares of recent years, and it reinforces the lesson that the principal danger of democratic government is the potency of an emotional tide sweeping like a deluge over a population, carrying before it every bulwark of common sense, obliterating the most elementary traces of reason, hurling to the ground all obstacles, individuals, or parties, that make a stand against it, and hurrying a nation into courses of danger and destruction. More aptly we might compare it to an epidemic. The bacilli are carefully cultivated in one or two great laboratories. Suitable subjects are inoculated, and the fever rapidly spreads. The remedies are known, but it is a part of the disease that the patient refuses to take them. He turns with frenzy on his doctors, and reserves his worship for the inoculator, whose methods and objects, nevertheless, in his sane moments he pretty shrewdly suspects. The average man is a most receptive host to the panic bacillus. It is not a question of class or of education. All suffer alike. They take the poison as though it were food. The sober business man, the income-tax payer still conscious of the hole made by his last payment in his banking account, the reading man, who long ago came to the conclusion that the South African frenzy was an artificial product—all alike are ready for the infection. One would almost say they lust after it. They are ready for any sensation, and shiver deliciously over the anticipation that makes their blood run cold. The deeper underlying sense lodged in the saner background of consciousness that the whole danger is illusory is the climax of their delight. They have all the sensation of terror which thrilled Mr. Malthus at the meetings of the Suicide Club, perfected by the inner conviction that they will never really draw the fatal lot. They are enjoying a dramatic spectacle in which they are at once actors and audience, and are proportionately irate with the obstinate few who would shatter the illusion by telling them the cold truth.

But it is precisely here that the real danger lies. The situation is not one to play with. There is a core of seriousness in the matter of Anglo-German relations, and it needs statesmanship among our public men, and rational self-control among our people to deal with it. A new European situation has arisen. Germany is coming to occupy in Europe a position not unlike that once held by Spain, and later and longer by France. Her influence among purely Continental Powers is becoming paramount, and, as in former days, so now, this paramountcy, or tendency to paramountcy, induces England to throw her weight into the opposite scale. But she is not merely a Continental Power. She is developing a great mercantile marine, and, rightly or wrongly, considers that she needs a navy partly for its protection, partly as a diplomatic asset in that game of concessions upon which Protectionist countries largely rely for the development of their commerce. Whether she is wise in her own interests in thus seeking to become a great naval as well as the greatest military Power at one and the same time is open to very serious doubt. It is a combination which, we think, has never been successfully maintained, and looking at the financial difficulties in which it is already involving Germany, it does not seem as though it could be pursued now without grave detriment to her internal progress. However, for good or for evil, there it is, the settled policy for the time being of her statesmen. That an agreement with this country would be to the infinite advantage of both parties is clear to sane men on both sides of the German Ocean. Our Government has done well in making informal overtures, but before we make too much of the stolid refusal of the Germans to listen to them, we must ask ourselves whether any offer not involving some modification of the right of capture would be worth considering by a Power in Germany's position. She has all her Jingoes to tell her that not a ship that sails under her flag is safe in the event of hostilities until she has a fleet that can cope with ours. They will tell her that it is we, with our overwhelming naval force, who in the teeth of our own safety—which in war time would depend on the free admission of oversea food supplies—insist on retaining the right to seize private property for its value as a weapon of offence; and that as a weapon of offence it is specially valuable against a Power like Germany with a large mercantile marine and a narrow sea-board. It is clear, therefore, that before we rule Germany out of all negotiation as a Power that is bent on a single end, that declines the European point of view, and is steadfastly set on a path of cynical aggrandisement, we must first consider whether our statesmen have on their side taken a sufficiently wide view of our interest, or have barred the only kind of negotiation which, from the German point of view, would be worth entertaining.

Be this as it may, the development of the German naval power sets us a problem which may be solved along one of two lines. The first, and in itself far the preferable, is the solution by agreement. The second, if this is unattainable, is that of adjusting our own position, naval, military, and political, to the situation created by the growth of a new power. Either of these solutions is hindered, and may be fatally marred, by panic discussions such as those of the last week. As to the first, the mood of panic makes negotiation impossible. It is not merely that it loads the atmosphere with distrust. It is, even more, that it tends to place all efforts at adjustment in a false light. For every Englishman retaining a sense of national dignity, there is something bitter in the contrast between the excitement of this country—once the wonder of Europe for its coolness and phlegm—its alternation of shrieks of indignant protest with something like a whine of terror, and the stolid, unmoved persistence of the Germans in their established course. It is unbeautiful, but the contrast is not the less galling to anyone with a sense of what England's reputation has been, and what is being made of it by a small knot of newspaper proprietors, hounded on by politicians who put a Parliamentary or electoral triumph above patriotism. In such circumstances it is difficult to suggest negotiation. It is hard to obtain the necessary mental atmosphere for free and equal discussion. The panic-monger is too nearly successful in confounding the peacemaker's efforts with his own convulsive protests.

But if negotiation is abandoned for the alternative policy, the mood of panic is hardly less fatal. Every Conservative politician, even every Fleet Street journalist, knows in his heart that the maintenance of decided naval superiority, as an absolute necessity to the defence of the country, is as much the settled policy of this Government as of any other. But the means of national security are not to be confided to the specialist with his latest fad, still less to the mob who catch up his dicta without troubling to understand them. The pace of invention grows faster and more furious. The new scientific weapon of to-day is the toy of to-morrow, and the darling product of one expert is the derision of another. Those err who call in the expert judgment to counteract the mob. It is not the specialist that we want, but the statesman.

Of these real risks, that of an invasion by the Germans every sensible man knows to be the most remote. Anyone who will stay a moment to consider the problem, and will calm himself sufficiently to picture the Germans as human beings, guided by ordinary motives and reasonable probabilities, will recognise that it is an idea suited to no world but that of the melodrama. An Anglo-German war, if we were to base our forecast on the realities of the situation, would seem almost equally improbable. But here we cannot overlook the capacity of fear to beget the very danger which it falsely imagines already in existence. If the panic-mongers have their way, they will end by producing the state of mind on both sides in which a collision becomes a matter of chance. There will be those who will urge us to pounce on the German "Dreadnought" fleet when it is half built, regardless of all the contingencies of new inventions which, within a year or two, might put all "Dreadnoughts" out of account—and there will be those who, in consequence, will urge Germany to redouble her speed of building. Along this line, laid out by the panic-mongers, lies the real danger, which, if our statesmen are occupied in counterworking an imaginary unprovoked attack, they will too probably ignore. There are but few living men who can cope with such a psychological situation, and who can stand before frantic people and bring them back, by calm authority, to the mood of reason. To our shame and sorrow, as Liberals, we have to recognise that our own titular chief was the man to kindle the flame, and though we gladly recognise a better mood in later speeches, we have to admit that the Liberal Party finds itself once again possessed by feelings uncomfortably like those with which, ten years ago and more, it listened to another leader's successive appeals to its enemies against his own followers. But there is still in the Liberal ranks at least one man with the power and the authority to bring men to reason. Lord Morley withstood the hot-fit of jingoism, and history has amply justified his protest. Could the India Office spare him but for a day to the platform, there is none other who could, with such authority, rally the forces of Liberalism to a rational and serious consideration of what is necessary to the safety of the country.

THE TRUTH ABOUT GERMAN SHIPBUILDING.

> "That the French Government is preparing for war there can be no longer any doubt. From every barrack round Paris that boasts a rifle range comes the sound of rifle practice. The huge imports of steam coal to be stored in the North of France tell their own tale," &c., &c.—Pall Mall Gazette, August 22nd, 1900.
>
> "Are we, or are we not, going to live on the sufferance of a foreign Power? . . . Here and now, as in the France of 1797 and of 1870, the cry is beginning to re-echo through the barracks, "Citoyens, la Patrie est en danger.'"—Ibid, March 18th and 22nd, 1909.

We cannot be accused of hindering the efforts of statesmen who, having kindled a conflagration on the Navy, are now doing their best to put it out, if we say that, in our opinion, a moderate degree of forethought might have rendered both these operations unnecessary. Every end of British statesmanship, every point of security, might have been attained, first, by probing with due care the facts as to recent German shipbuilding; secondly, if they were as unfavorable as Mr. McKenna last week desired the House of Commons to believe, by acting on them without the sensational advertisement of a coming national peril. Such a course seems to us to possess every advantage over that which was adopted. To have alarming information, to ask Germany pointed questions concerning it, to receive assurances and contradictions, and then to speak as if they were of no consequence—is not a method of peace or of common sense. It is argued in defence of it that the Government thought it necessary to alarm their followers into a withdrawal of Mr. Harvey's amendment. Was it also necessary to alarm the whole nation, much as Ho-ti burned down his house in order to taste roast pork? Had the Estimates been placed in their true light, no such course would have suggested itself. The Government could have quietly informed their friends that they had decided to pursue a course the keynote of which was moderation, combined with watchfulness. The Party, one of the most loyal we have ever known, would have accepted such a view, and co-operated with it. And we note that it is at this point, thanks to Mr. Balfour's attempt to turn ships and sailors into grist for his party mill, that the Government has arrived. The Prime Minister, instead of picturing a steadily narrowing and heightening contest of strength between Germany and England in one type of war vessel, produces a list of British ironclads of all kinds comparable in length to the catalogue of ships in the second Iliad, and the two representatives of the Admiralty exhaust the resources of arithmetic in order to attest the "unchallenged and unchallengeable" supremacy of the British Navy, now and at every juncture up to 1912. We are assured that in addition to a certain superiority of three "Dreadnoughts," we shall possess an overwhelming preponderance in pre-Dreadnought battleships and in armored cruisers, a superiority which, like the advantage that all students of the Navy admit to-day is nearer three, or even four, than two to one. Putting Mr. Asquith's estimate in a tabular form, we arrive at the following conclusions:—

PRE-"DREADNOUGHTS" IN 1912.

ENGLAND.	GERMANY.
40 battleships of 585,000 tons and 650 guns.	20 battleships of 241,000 tons and 384 guns.
35 armoured cruisers of 416,000 tons carrying 470 guns.	8 cruisers of 78,500 tons, carrying 112 guns—to which we may add Dr. Macnamara's calculation that in this so-called "peril" year the warships we possess give a total displacement of 1,001,985 tons, against Germany's total of 319,589 tons, and 1,126 guns, all of 6 inches and over, against Germany's 496 guns of 5·9 inches and over, with 128,000 men to fight them against Germany's 54,000.

But having touched the region of fact, we have to note some serious qualifications of Mr. McKenna's assertions as to Germany's power of producing "Dreadnoughts" so quickly as almost to nullify our long start in this type of war-vessel, and so secretly as to cast grave suspicion on the good faith of her statesmen and their honesty in interpreting fixed standards of naval policy. We shall take a reserved view of this most grave matter, and assume that the specific and official German denials of the suggestions in Mr. McKenna's speech lack complete authority until Prince Bülow has formally given his seal to them. But we are bound to point out that, if they are true, or anything like true, they utterly destroy the Admiralty case about the "Dreadnoughts." The most extreme of these assertions are gone already, and on Thursday the Prime Minister qualified others. The idea of four German ships of the programme of 1909-10 having been accelerated is not tenable, and the Admiralty do not maintain it, though they base their calculations on it. For the rest, the gravamen of Mr. McKenna's indictment lay in three points—first, that Germany was stretching the letter of her programme so as to overhaul us in the "Dreadnought" race between now and 1912 or 1913; secondly, that she could now build as fast as we could, practically at the rate of a "Dreadnought" in two years; thirdly, that as the result of these manœuvres and efforts, she might, in the spring of 1912, possess seventeen completed "Dreadnoughts."

Now the official communiqué in the "Kölnische Zeitung" denies all these statements. And one of its affirmations calls for a further explanation from Mr. McKenna. The Germans admit that orders were given late last year for two ships included in the programme of this year. But they state that these orders went to private yards in response to a plea of the shipowners to meet the emptiness of business and the state of unemployment, not for a military or a political end. The Government, it is understood, received explanations from Count Metternich. Was not this statement included in them, and, if it was, why was it not given to the House of Commons? We come to the second point, the gravely increased German capacity to turn out "Dreadnoughts." This, again, the German statement entirely contravenes. It gives a period more nearly approaching three than two years as the average date of production for "Dreadnoughts." This, at least, is in harmony with such recorded facts as we possess concerning the actual progress that Germany has made in the construction of these ships. Take the first two German "Dreadnoughts," the "Nassau" and the "Westfalen." The first has been greatly delayed by accidents; neither will be ready within three years of their being voted. According to the "Navy League Annual," the big cruiser which was launched the other day was nine months late. The same authority states that the three battleships of the 1908 programme had not been begun within months of their appointed dates. The specific statement as to the advance in all these ships made by Admiral von Tirpitz and the "Kölnische Zeitung," is that only by the end of 1912 will as many as thirteen be on the seas. The official German table of "Dreadnoughts," therefore, runs as follows:—

SHIPS (13).	READY.
Nassau	1910 (Summer.)
Westfalen
Rheinland
Posen
(Cruiser) Von der Tann ...
Ersatz-Siegfried ...	1911 (Summer or Autumn).
Ersatz-Oldenburg ...
Ersatz-Beowulf ...
(Cruiser) G.
Ersatz-Frithjof ...	1912 (Two in Spring; two in Winter).
Ersatz-Heimdal ...
Ersatz-Hildebrand
(Cruiser) H.

It follows that in April, 1912, there will be, not seventeen German "Dreadnoughts," but eleven, compared either with eighteen or twenty-two English "Dreadnoughts" and "Lord Nelsons." We admit that some discount may be taken off all these calculations, for they have the unreal character of applying to a totally new experiment in shipbuilding. But the Power which is making these vessels says definitely that she can only produce them within certain limits of time, and her statements are largely corroborated by a careful article from the Berlin correspondent of the "Westminster Gazette," in explanation of Count Reventlow's views and statements. According to this writer, two years cannot be taken as a measure of the capacity of the German yards to finish a ship of the "Dreadnought" class. If that statement is true, Mr. Asquith's and Mr. McKenna's estimates cannot stand, and Mr. Balfour's hypotheses reduce themselves to an airy imagination of "two German keels" for every one that can exist.

Can we therefore assume that the basis of British alarms has disappeared? That would be too large a conclusion; for it will remain so long as any plausible case can be constructed for the theory of a steady, secret German plan, backed by a stream of diplomatic lies to Liberals and friends of peace, to undermine the predominant power of the British Navy. It ought to be enough to say that such a plan is a phantasy, because (a) we should never permit it, (b) we could not help knowing it long before it reached a point of peril, and (c) no sane German statesman could contemplate such a design by means of a two or three years' race in "Dreadnought" building. But mere argument from the probabilities, even from the sanities, of life and politics is insufficient. Prince Bülow is not without grave responsibility in this matter. This scare has almost passed; but others will come. One may be fatal to peace. Will he not take account of this danger? Will he be as plain as the "Kölnische Zeitung" in the matter of the progress of the German ships? Will he not take pains in his coming statement to satisfy the elements of doubt which spring even to more reasonable British minds when, through the magnifying glass of their fears and the crude representations of them which they meet in the popular journals, they picture a new, ambitious State encamped at their doors, and aiming at naval as well as military supremacy? No war is, or ever was, inevitable, least of all a war between Germany and England. But it is not impossible that the "unruly regiment" within this nation may bring it about, and he would be a sanguine man who, after the experiences of last week, would wholly trust British statesmen, or even British intellectuals, to avert it.

THE MOTIVES OF GERMAN POLICY.

The controversy over the Navy will result in the formation of random and superficial opinions until both nations have gone behind the crude facts about programmes and shipbuilding to the diplomatic situation that underlies them. Three types of statement confront us at the outset. There is, first, the conventional declaration that the relations of Great Britain and Germany are friendly and correct. The statement is true only because in the diplomatic vocabulary the word "friendly" has acquired a technical meaning which covers any state of tension short of a rupture. There is next the irrelevant assertion that between the two nations there is no real hostility and no desire for war. That is true of the pastors and working men who have visited this country. It is true of the masses whom they represent, and above all it is true of the electors who gave the Social Democrats and the Centre a majority of votes, though not of seats, in the "khaki" election of 1906. But while diplomacy remains in Germany, as elsewhere, a secret game carried on by a bureaucracy that reflects the sentiments of a small ruling class, the masses enter only as one factor into the reckoning. Finally, there is the opinion, expressed in this country with growing assurance by a widening circle of "experts," that Germany is deliberately preparing such a war against us as Bismarck waged first against Austria and then against France. The Bismarckian tradition is not dead. But two decisive reasons negative this suggestion. In the first place, the Danish, the Austrian, and the French campaigns were part of a long plan by which Bismarck unified the Empire. To create a nation, even a scrupulous statesman will adopt methods to which he would never resort in the effort to aggrandise or enrich a State already strong.

In the second place, such a project would presuppose a navy surpassing the wildest ambitions, even of the Fleet-Professors. No Power, unless it is fighting for its life under the pressure of necessity, ever provokes war, until it believes itself to be markedly superior to the enemy. The present panic has suggested several measures of superiority. Some say two to one, others three to two, in capital ships. But no sane man in these islands would think that we had a superiority if the rival "Dreadnoughts" outnumbered our own, and behind them was a reserve fleet of seventy-five against twenty-eight. Why, then, should the Germans cherish such a dream? They cannot imagine that with an inferior navy they could safely provoke us. They cannot suppose that we will allow them to attain anything approaching equality. Nor could they waste their resources in attempting equality, without weakening their power on land. The hypothesis of a deliberate war may, therefore, be dismissed. Bismarck made deliberate war on Austria and France only when and only because he was quite certain that his army was more than a match for theirs. There is no use in war without victory, and no reasonable expectation of victory without superior force.

What, then, was the motive for the German programme? In the first place, it is sometimes well to remember that we are not the only Power in the world, nor is ours the only navy against which Germany builds. Though Germany cannot dream of attacking our naval supremacy, she may naturally desire to have a powerful fleet for purposes of defence. The possession of such a fleet, even if in the end it would certainly be defeated, is a real protection, for it means that even a much stronger Power would hesitate to provoke a conflict for a frivolous reason. Victory might be certain, but victory would cost the aggressor dear. It is primarily for that reason, and largely no doubt with this country in her mind, that Germany desires to have a strong fleet. Its uses in diplomatic rivalry are sufficiently obvious. It means that in any future wrangle over (let us say) Morocco, German diplomacy can a few years hence afford to be a little stiffer than it is to-day. The danger point in a diplomatic conflict recedes somewhat further with each capital ship completed. In a vital issue the supremacy of our fleet would still carry the day. But we might be a little less ready to regard such a question as the expansion of our friend France in North Africa as a vital issue to ourselves, if a conflict at sea were certain to cost us not, indeed, defeat, but the loss of a few good ships. The calculation seems brutal. But it is in such terms that we must learn to interpret the vague phrases about sea-power and the diplomatic balance.

The first step in facing such a situation as this is to attain sufficient mental hardness to see the facts without coloring them with our ideals. There has been in progress ever since M. Delcassé and Lord Lansdowne concluded the Anglo-French entente a struggle to modify what is called the "balance of power" in Europe. The ablest of M. Delcassé's literary lieutenants, M. Victor Bérard, described it in a striking metaphor. Germany is a Gothic cathedral. When iconoclasts want to destroy it, they do not storm it with hammers and pickaxes; they simply cut the flying buttresses. Hence the "debauching" of Italy from the Triple Alliance and all the other phases of the process of "penning in"—the entente with Russia, the substitution of British for German influence in Turkey, and the dynastic ties which now link Norway and Spain to the Triple Entente. The operation has been brilliantly successful. But when statesmen aspire to a balance of power, they rarely aspire to an equipoise. They want such a supremacy as can be interpreted in terms of opportunity for foreign expansion. That expansion need not be formally territorial. Annexations are as much out of date as alliances. To-day we think in ententes and spheres of influence. The permanence of our occupation of Egypt, the penetration of Morocco, the division of Persia into economic spheres—these are the positive fruits to the partners in our Triplice. On the other hand the Germans, when they complain of being "penned in," do not mean that they are in danger of being besieged in Europe. They mean that their diplomatic situation is no longer favorable for the acquisition of such "places in the sun" as have fallen to their rivals. The danger and expense incident to the annexation of Bosnia, merely formal though the change was, proves the accuracy of their diagnosis. That a few more "Dreadnoughts" would render such operations slightly less risky is probably at bottom the calculation which inspires their Navy programme.

It is easy to diagnose the causes of such a situation as this. We entered deliberately with the French entente into the intimate struggles of Continental politics, in which the Russian rapprochement entangled us still more deeply, while it robbed the coalition of its seemingly Liberal character. The Germans think they understand the significance of the fact that the King when he goes to Reval is attended by Sir John Fisher and Sir John French—officials who have no similar duty to perform when he goes to Berlin. Having concluded with France and Russia an understanding which clearly partakes of the character of an alliance, it is impossible to conclude the same sort of arrangement with Germany. Nor should we wish, if it were possible, to bargain away with her the future of some non-European State, China, perhaps, or Asiatic Turkey, on the lines of the Moroccan and Persian agreements. Our policy has strayed so far from any Liberal ideal that it is difficult to indicate any immediate remedy. The main task is to restore some measure of solidarity to Europe, a condition of feeling in which problems could be approached on their merits, and not simply as the Moroccan and Balkan affairs were, simply as phases in the rivalry of two groups of Powers. France, probably, now desires such an amelioration, and Russia has lately felt her weakness acutely. Something, perhaps, might be achieved by a frank approach, and an attempt to remove the smaller rivalries—that, for instance, of the several groups of favored capitalists in Turkey, and, above all, that which menaces the future of the Baghdad railway. If some arrangement could be reached on this economic ground, it might be possible thereafter to approach the naval question, but only if we were prepared to surrender the right of capture at sea. If some of the concrete grounds of antagonism could one by one be removed, there might be less reason for Europe to remember that it is divided into two camps. Whatever tends to aggravate that division, any manœuvre which can be interpreted as a closing of the "pen," or a cutting of the "flying buttresses," is a treason to the idea of Europe.

THE HOPE OF A REVIVAL OF TRADE.

Is there any hope of a fairly early revival of trade? The question is an important one, and we will try to answer it. The year 1907 was a boom year for British and European trade, but the last three months were marked by the tremendous financial and commercial collapse in the United States. The year 1908 was a year of gradually declining trade in Great Britain and most parts of Europe. Trade at home remained fairly good until May. From then until October the decline was rapid, and there were serious strikes in the cotton and shipbuilding trades. After October, signs of recovery were seen, and unless some unexpected misfortune happens we rather think that the worst is over.

The principal grounds for this hopeful view are three:—First, an examination of statistical evidence; second, the recovery in Canada and the United States; third, the Indian harvest and the improvement of the trade with China. Let us take these three considerations in order, dealing first with the Board of Trade returns relating to the imports, exports, and re-exports for each month. In January and February, 1908, the fall in prices had begun, and the values of our imports and exports were distinctly lower than in the corresponding month of the previous year. The decline in imports was heaviest in April, 1908, when imports into the United Kingdom were valued at 17 per cent. less than in April, 1907. The decline in exports, as might be expected, showed worst a little later, being 16·6 per cent. in July and 18·7 per cent. in August and again in November. In September last imports made a temporary spurt, and were a trifle higher than in September, 1907; but October showed a decline of 11·9 per cent, and November of 12·7 per cent. The comparative figures for the last three months have, however, been distinctly better than for any three months since March. The actual figures for February were:—

	1908.	1909.
Imports	£52,428,000	£50,468,000
Exports of British Produce	£31,949,000	£28,024,000
Re-exports of Foreign and Colonial Produce	£7,497,000	£8,473,000

But prices are about 5 per cent. lower than at this time last year, so that we may fairly assume that our foreign trade is now not much, if at all, less in volume than it was last February and March. But there is this important difference—that, while a rapid downward movement had set in at the beginning of 1908, a less pronounced but distinctly upward tendency is now visible. This cheerful view, it should be added, is strongly confirmed by the statistics of employment.

In Canada and the United States, where the depression in manufacturing, mining, and commerce generally was far more acute, the recovery is already marked, though unemployment in the industrial towns and mining districts is still worse than in the old country. Probably the output, which was from 25 to 50 per cent. of normal from November, 1907, to June, 1908, is now generally from 70 to 80 per cent. of normal. The decline in American railway traffics was, of course, much heavier than in British, and the falling off in foreign trade was enormous, leading, as President Taft remarks in his message, to an estimated deficiency of 100,000,000 dollars in revenue. The recovery in the United States, however, cannot help us very much until the new tariff has been passed, and has come into operation. Whether this will be in June, July, or August, is impossible to say. Meanwhile, in view of the probability that a fairly general, and possibly a substantial diminution in customs duties may result, merchants in the United States will restrict their importations to the actual requirements of their customers. Here is the opinion, only a fortnight old, of an American industrial magnate; it will be seen that he does not at all expect any immediate boom in trade:—

> "Two things must exercise concern. First of all I am watching the agricultural conditions very closely, for we never needed good crops more than we do now. Wall Street, of course, is mad over 'tips,' and has scarcely a thought for what is going on throughout the agricultural regions, but it is unnecessary to explain to what extent our prosperity rests on farms. Next, trade will be retarded until tariff revision has been completed. On the whole, I do not look for prosperous times until towards the close of this year at the earliest; if they come early next year I will feel satisfied."

A more immediate ground for hope is the recent improvement in the Far Eastern trade, especially with China. Of this there can be no doubt. Much has been expected of India; but, so far, this expectation has been disappointed. Though all the crops have been good, the terrible failure of last year's harvest has crippled the merchants of Calcutta and Bombay, and of all the great towns. Stores of food had run so low that the exports will not be very large. But the wheat crop of North-West India is several weeks late, and its effect may not be felt until April. Then, if it proves as good as estimates indicate, there will be fairly heavy exports to England and a corresponding outward flow of Lancashire goods to India is almost certain to follow. India may not prove quite so good a customer this year as was hoped, but she ought certainly to be able to take more than in the second half of last year.

Two other considerations of great importance must be mentioned which may fairly be allowed to balance one another—dear food and cheap money. On March 13th the "Gazette" price of wheat was 35s. 8d. per quarter, compared with 31s. 3d. in 1908, and 26s. 10d. in 1907. It stands to reason that the demand of the working-classes at home and abroad for the secondary necessaries of life—clothes, boots, &c.—must be pro tanto diminished, but luckily beef, mutton, potatoes, and rice are all considerably cheaper. Oatmeal, moreover, is practically the same as last year, and rye (owing to a splendid harvest in Germany) is cheaper. Whether the good wheat harvests of Australia and India will balance the reduced crops of Argentina nobody can predict; but there seems, on the whole, a probability that the present very high price will not be long maintained. In any case cheap money, which is the mother of commercial enterprise, seems likely to last, provided that peace can be maintained in the Balkans. After the end of the quarter a fall in the bank rate is confidently expected in the City; and a long spell of cheap money has almost invariably been the prelude to commercial and industrial activity.

Life and Letters.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF A SCARE.

Everybody knows the state of irritable despondency in which a fit of dissipation or of mental excitement leaves a man when it is passing off. The collective mind of a people, normally below the level of its average members in capacity of self-control, suffers an even more degrading reaction. No small part of the moral damage of war is the perilous romanticism which supposes that after the bloodshed is wiped up by an amiable "settlement," and the shattered finances are restored, the whole ugly incident belongs to "history." Thus the heaviest cost, the shock to our inner credit, is left out of account. The Boer war found us self-confident, and left us sensitive to the verge of hysteria. Now there is a recognised rhythmic action in hysteria, a tendency to gather towards the periodic crisis of a nerve storm, the eruption of what "psycho-therapeutics" calls a "hysteriod." It looks as if some such law might be traceable in the collective mind of our people. At any rate it is worth while trying to trace the nervous action of the perverted patriotism which shows itself in these storms of mingled funk and ferocity. The seeds of trouble were the intense anti-foreign feeling generated during the Boer war. Incredible as it sometimes appears to the memory, there was a period in 1900 and 1901 when persons speaking a foreign tongue in the streets of London were exposed to a danger of physical attack. Every foreigner was a pro-Boer, or, to the more ignorant, a veritable Boer. When the passion died down, it left a lingering resentment which made it easier than before to think evil of a foreign government or people.

This legacy of anti-foreign feeling was fairly indiscriminate in its direction. Its full force was very nearly made available against France and Russia. It was not until Mr. Chamberlain had begun to execute his plan of converting military into commercial Jingoism that Germany in particular began to get upon our nerves. By the false pretence that nations trade with one another as nations, and that their interests in this trade are antagonistic, Protection endeavors to set nation against nation. In this falsification of commerce it was natural enough that Germany should be placed in the foreground as our most formidable rival, and that every gain of hers should figure as a loss of ours. This process could not fail of its effect. That effect must not, however, be exaggerated. It is not one of burning jealousy, still less one of exasperation, but of general sensitiveness and suspicion, with a sufficient tincture of ill-will to make our usually good-natured people glad if Germany should get a set-back. It is, of course, essential to the situation that there should be in certain sections of Germany a corresponding gathering of anti-British feeling. Into the particular nature of this feeling we need not enter here: it is sufficient to remind ourselves that our entente with Russia and France would give as much food as is necessary to the Anglophobiacs of Germany.

Such a condition of the popular mind is not in itself particularly dangerous, except so far as it provides fuel for incendiaries. Unfortunately, incendiaries are not lacking in the worlds of politics, finance, and the Press. Though there is no section of our people which desires war with Germany, or with any other nation, there are various powerful political cliques and business interests quite willing to play with fire for their own profitable ends. Behind this drive towards extravagant armaments, stands a union of forces almost identical with that which engineered the Boer War, except that for the mining financiers must now be substituted the manufacturers who are finding money for Tariff Reform, and who hope to force on Protection through financial embarrassments. The Jingoism of 1909 is, in some ways, more contemptible than that of 1899, for it contains more funk than fight. But it uses the same instruments and operates upon the same popular susceptibilities. The Boer War showed how it could be done. An "independent" Press, placing itself at the disposal of "high" finance and "high" society, pours jets of sensational news and malign conjecture upon a public mind staggered by the variety of "evidence" and its congruity. The public knew nothing of Mr. Rhodes's telegraphic factory at Groote Schuur, or the feeding of the entire British Press from a single fund of information. Nor do they know to-day the grouping of our Press, which has enabled two proprietors and one editor personally to conduct this naval scare through the columns of a dozen journals.

The art of awakening popular passion may be said to have been a discovery of ten years ago, for then, for the first time, a Yellow Press "came by its own" in this country. It learnt then the value of mingling bare sensational assertion with suggestive imputations. Once sow in the general mind the notion of an intriguing enemy who will not come out into the open, but is making dangerous preparations under cover, no limit is set upon credulity. The secret arming of the Boers to drive the British from South Africa is the counterpart to the naval preparation for invading these shores imputed to Germany. Having once fixed this insidious intention, you are liberated from the necessity of bringing evidence to support your allegations of fact, because the inability to produce evidence follows from the secrecy of the proceeding. So, by degrees, you get to that command of the public mind which enables you to use the sort of language illustrated in last Wednesday's "Times," that "private advices recently received from an unimpeachable source corroborate the view that any slackening in British shipbuilding will be followed by a corresponding acceleration of German shipbuilding, and vice versâ." A curious feature of this credulity, also exhibited ten years ago, is the fact that "education" seems to furnish no prophylactic. Sober, hard-headed men of business, the learned professions, the Universities, succumb to these shallow arts of panic-mongering with hardly more resistance than the votaries of the tap-room or the Stock Exchange. When one finds a man of Mr. Frederic Harrison's past flinging up his hat for militarism, it is difficult to set limits on the power of panic to inhibit judgment. As soon as our notion of other people's intentions begins to figure before our mind as an unimpeachable fact, we have to build ships, not against the ships they are building, or even against the ships they are able to build, but against some phantom fleet continually doubling in our disordered imagination.

But it is not right to over-estimate the gravity of such a panic: its levity is not less characteristic. The persons who most seriously and earnestly believe that England should lay down two ships against each German ship are the contractors; next in seriousness and persistence rank the Services and their official confederates; following them is a little school of alarmist politicians who soak their minds with "balances of power" and the "inevitable" clash of races. But the British people do not seriously fear Germany, do not seriously believe in the intended invasion, do not seriously intend to devote their mind and money to the single task of national defence. No such thing. They have simply given themselves to the enjoyment of an effervescent scare, worked up to a sensational head, as its silly artificers now avow, to rush the Government. But it is of the nature of a rush that it cannot last, and there are already signs of slackening in the popular excitement. Short though our memories may be, Fashoda, Peking, Mafeking night, and the Dogger Bank are not entirely wiped out, and we are beginning to generate some power of suspecting our suspicions—a sure sign of returning sanity.

THE TWIN STARS OF POETRY.

It was a curious myth that gave the brothers of Helen, those young-eyed stars, an immortality of alternate days. Like the sons of men, they were buried in corruption, but every other day they rose again and gleamed upon the heavens or rode their snow-white steeds in the forefront of battle. By another story, death had dominion over only one, and his brother, on alternate days, unable longer to endure the separation, descended into the unseen world until the morrow's sun. Man's yearning for the dead suggested that beautiful variation in the worship, but obviously it was but a fond desire. For there, before all eyes, whenever the twin stars gleamed upon the heavens, they were together, and in the forefront of the battle those white horses galloped side by side.

A hundred years ago Byron and Shelley, those young-eyed stars of England, had not passed through mortality, nor taken their place above the horizon in our sky. Shelley was still at Eton; Byron, just of age, was making ready for his first voyage to Greece. But, rather than miss an opportunity in this year of centenaries, the Greek Societies last week began celebrating that first journey, which was to mean so much for Greece; and this week suddenly Messrs. Burns and Oates issue a book which will recall all thoughts to Shelley. It is no mere coincidence. Though dimmed to sight at times, or half-forgotten in the charm of later worships, their white stars shine together upon the heavens of our literature, and in the forefront of our battle their gleaming horses charge like one.

It is true, no two poets could be more different. There was a time when young men, growing, as Mr. Stephen Paget has said, more like Shelley every minute, would have fainted to hear the god of their idolatry named in the same breath as Byron. Such a halo of iridescence was thrown round the name that people who valued sanity were obliged to withdraw from it for a while as from a lunar influence. When Matthew Arnold spoke of Shelley as "a beautiful and ineffectual angel, beating in the void his luminous wings in vain," it was at this shadowy and iridescent phantom that he was striking. But, like Hamlet's friends striking at the ghost with partizans, he did it wrong, being so angelical, to offer it the show of violence. It was the beauty of youth's heart which composed and saw that lovely ghost. In Shelley the heart of youth at last perceived a vision of the being it so much desired. Let professors and puritans chatter about Harriet, and exclaim, "What a set!" as they read of the men and women who once had the glory of knowing Shelley in the flesh. Youth had a vision of a spirit that could not be touched by the defilement of earth—"a pard-like spirit, beautiful and swift"—a spirit plumed with strong desire, floating above the earth like a flame, uttering the sweetest voice that ever used our language, impassioned for the cause of man, confident of human victory, and possessed by intuitions of eternal things. And that spirit had once been enclosed in a brilliant-eyed form of singular beauty and attractiveness, had lived as though outside the common ruts and puddles of this world, had loved whoever was lovable with high and uncalculating passion, and had died the fitting death, still young, in Nature's arms, secure from the contagion of the world's slow stain.

Certainly the heart of youth was right. It was the true Shelley of whom youth had a vision which it would not willingly undo. The rest did not count. If a great critic called an angel ineffectual, well, there were plenty of efficient persons to carry on the Education Office in company with the critic. If virtuous people charged an angel with indifference to the laws of virtue, well, there was a good deal of virtue in every street, and plenty of indifference colder than Shelley's. Secure in the heart of the matter, why waste time gossiping about the husks and excrescences? It is the same with that book which we said had recalled us to Shelley this week—a brief, republished essay by Francis Thompson, one of the few of Shelley's successors who can be named beside him for a certain assurance and splendor of symbolic thought—a power of perceiving under the many-colored dome of life the white radiance of eternity. The whole essay is of interest as a criticism on Shelley, but of far greater interest as a criticism upon Francis Thompson himself. For in its few pages there are passages upon the Church and sin and personal immortality which give us true glimpses of the writer's soul. But they have little more concern with the essence of Shelley than has a mordant description of what life means to an unhappy poet, whom the author calls Mangan, but draws from the memory of his own wretchedness.

His protest against the over-carefulness of modern art—a protest so significant in a poet whose danger was difficult and perverse elaboration—his protest against our self-conscious simplicity, too, and our habit of sentimentalising over children, whereas Shelley was the eternal and uncorrupted child; his analysis of the poet's childlike nature, able to see a world in a grain of sand, to deal with abstractions as simple and visible things, and to hope continually that in the next object of his love he will assuredly find the perfect satisfaction of unlimited desire—how excellent and penetrating all this criticism is! And with what splendor of language it is expressed, except only when the writer yields to the fantastic and tells us of "the established canons that had been spiked by poet after poet!" For the strength of the essay, and for its weakness equally, we may give the final summary:—

> "Enchanted child," Francis Thompson wrote, "born into a world unchildlike; spoiled darling of Nature, playmate of her elemental daughters; 'pard-like spirit, beautiful and swift,' laired amidst the burning fastnesses of his own fervid mind; bold foot along the verges of precipitous dream; light leaper from crag to crag of inaccessible fancies; towering genius, whose soul rose like a ladder between heaven and earth, with the angels of song ascending and descending it;—he is shrunken into the little vessel of death, and sealed with the unshatterable seal of doom, and cast down deep below the rolling tides of Time. Mighty meat for little guests, when the heart of Shelley was laid in the cemetery of Caius Cestius!"

What a paltry thought in consummation of sentences so superb! Francis Thompson speaks of the deepest depth of agony that could find consolation in the immortality promised in the familiar lines of "Adonais," beginning:—

> "He is a portion of that loveliness
> Which once he made more lovely."

We may admit that the consolation is cold, however beautiful; yet, compared with that thought of "mighty meat for little guests," how radiant with glory are those last lines of the great elegy:—

> "Whilst burning through the inmost veil of Heaven,
> The soul of Adonais, like a star,
> Beacons from the abode where the Eternal are."

Leaving this exquisite spirit, "half angel and half bird," if ever poet was, how shall we pass to his twin star in that constellation which guided sailors through the gloom and storm of a century ago? We must quit the moony boats of the air, the rainbow arcs, the paths of tempest, the building of the clouds, the spirit of night upon the western wave, and the fairy transformations of a world. We shall hear no more the song of the dancing stars and dædal earth. We shall drop to a city much like London, and find ourselves moving beside a spirit half coxcomb and half god. Let us listen again to the great critic, and hear him upbraid Byron with faults of negligence, diffuseness, repetition, vulgarity, and affectation. The censure is all true enough, and it is a long way to travel to such a man from a luminous angel, however ineffectual. But that last stanza of "Adonais" itself suggests the passage:—

> "My spirit's bark is driven
> Far from the shore, far from the trembling throng
> Whose sails were never to the tempest given."

Unlike in almost every quality of spirit and expression, Shelley and Byron were twin brothers in sailing far from the shore, far from the trembling throng. Side by side they dared the tempest across untrodden ways, and side by side they charged in the forefront of the battle of freedom:—

> "Yet freedom, yet, thy banner torn but flying, > Streams like a thunder-storm against the wind."

So Byron cried, and in that thunderstorm of freedom the twin constellation shone. We cannot say what that age had done or what our age has left undone that their war for freedom should have been illumined by two such stars, and ours by none to compare. Certainly, it was an age when the world was upheaving like dough round working leaven. In the "Revolt of Islam," Shelley could well write, "Methinks those who now live have survived an age of despair." Byron in his letters could write, "I have simplified my politics into an utter detestation of all existing governments." Certainly the disturbing leaven of freedom was working well. But at the present moment it is set upon work equally wholesome and disturbing, and if that age had its French Revolution and the shattering of empires, let us think what Russia is doing now, and what the Turks, and how all the peoples of the world are stirring against the dulness of oppression and uninspired habit. In that age the west wind was, through Shelley's lips to unwakened earth, the trumpet of a prophecy.

> "Hereditary bondsmen! Know ye not,
> Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow?"

cried Byron to the captive nationality for which he died. It is not for want of occasion that no two such poets to-day either wake the earth with the trumpet of prophecy or inspire the nations themselves to strike the blow.

What exuberance the two men had, what careless fertility, profuse and beneficent as the world's! What unwavering courage and vital personality! And they died at an age when our best writers are scarcely beginning. As we think of them, we feel again the awe that fell on Europe when the news came from Missolonghi. There lay the man adored in every land. Each word he spoke echoed through every tongue. The whole world lived in his thought, and was lighted by the easy splendor of his wit. He had given the people the pictures and emotions for which they then were longing. In the midst of rhetoric and self-conscious feelings that the world delighted to share, he at times would produce a verse—a whole series of verses—that appeared to come direct from the hand of some power higher than himself. And now at the height of his fame he was to die, fighting in freedom's cause for a people whom he knew to be of little worth. The world heard that, as he lay dying in delirium, he cried, as though he were mounting a breach in an assault, "Forward—Forward—Courage—Follow my example!" And as a thunderstorm burst in grandeur over that far-off town, the Aetolian mountaineers whispered to each other, "The great man is gone!" It was, after all, as fine a passage as his brother-poet's out of mortality to the abode whence their constellation still beacons. For it was in an assault upon the bondage of man's spirit that they lived and fell.

THE FURIOUS CENTURY.

"The age," says Mrs. Cust, of the dying fifteenth century, "had cast itself loose from the ordinary moorings of national and international morality." The vision of the earlier days of St. Louis and St. Francis had faded from men's minds. Christianity—in practice—had broken down before the impact of the seven deadly sins. Men were inclined to despair of the future of civilisation. Charles Reade, in a work of genius, has presented an unforgettable picture of this troublous time in the story of "The Cloister and the Hearth." The accuracy of his description is guaranteed by such a fascinating volume as Mrs. Cust has made out of contemporary records of fightings and wanderers. In "Gentlemen Errant" (John Murray) she tells skilfully, with humor and eloquence and liberal quotation from the original documents, the story of four gentlemen of the age. The first was a "Bohemian Ulysses," who voyaged out into Western Europe with his comrades, to see what manner of place the world was, beyond the frontiers of that secluded kingdom. The second was the good knight Wilwalt, of Schaumburg, a "Master of War," who fought furiously as a soldier of fortune over Germany and the Netherlands—then one continuous and confused battlefield. The third was Frederick, Count and later Elector of the Palatine in the early fifteenth century, a personage of more historical importance. And the fourth was Hans von Schweinichen, a Silesian courtier whose journeys with his impoverished master, Heinrich XI., Lord of Leignitz, up and down Europe in vain search for a place where a man may enjoy life richly without paying for it, furnishes a memoir more diverting and jolly than any Dumas novel.

The mercenary soldier is already the scourge of Europe. In peace time he is "thrust out from his blooming garden of bloodshed," says Mrs. Cust, "into a barren wilderness of amity." In war time—which seems indeed more normal than peace—his sufferings and his cruelties are alike intolerable. The wounded and the sick find no bed of roses awaiting them. "From this man they plucked an arrow," writes one recorder, "from that dug a ball: to some they gave the Holy Sacrament, and to sundry they cried aloud that they should hold God in their hearts: for thus went the souls out of them." Misery and laughter are bedfellows, neither heeding the other. In disaster, the unwounded were "right merry: nor had any, who had not suffered, pity for the others." "On the one hand," testifies the Comte de Chimay at the siege of Neuss, "is singing and music, on the other weeping and pain. I hear on one side the cry, 'The King drinks,' with lively cheer; and on the other, 'Jesus,' to admonish those who are in the last pains of their passing. Into some rooms enter evil women, and into others the Cross to lead lifeless bodies to the grave." "God alone," he adds, "who knoweth the cause of these diversities, can explain these things."

And this fifteenth century combined the curiosity with the violence of children. In no epoch was travel more sought after. In few was travel more difficult. The English Channel was swarming with pirates, the forests and fields of all Western Europe were the home of cut-throats and thieves. Wars were perpetual, not only between great nations, but between little obscure principalities, accompanied by horrid slaughter and no respect—in the general devastation—for the passing wayfarer. The country itself was often bleak and inhospitable, much of it a desert. One party nearly perishes in Spain from heat and thirst, and is only saved by the discovery of a mulberry tree and its fruit. Another party, after incredible storms in the passage between Calais and Kent, wanders three days in the "mountains" between Winchelsea and London. The holiest places are not exempt. The Bohemian pilgrims, journeying with peril of land and sea from their remote kingdom to the great shrine of St. James in Galicia, found, on their arrival, the Cathedral fortified by one party and assailed by the other; Compostella in a state of civil war, in which the Bishop is brought out a prisoner by the besieging faction and butchered before the eyes of his relations. Inns were scanty and vile and rapacious. The pilgrim journey was a kind of free fight through the waste places of barbaric lands. Yet the whole impression is of a great company moving up and down the ways of Europe, and finding an immense zest in the adventure. They note with delight all changing things. They inquire concerning legends and relics and the stone of marvels. They delight in accepting the incredible. In one vision the sky is darkened as under the outpouring of the apocalyptic vials. Horrors and tortures are the materials of ordinary existence. When Charles the Bold is ravaging Lorraine, every tree in the landscape bears its human fruit of dead men hanging from the branches. Sinking ships and clanging fights and burning towns illuminate the pages of the chronicle. Men are boiled alive or roasted, suspended at a convenient distance from slow fires, or hacked slowly to pieces with knives. In the sacking of cities no quarter is given to men or women or children. It seems impossible to imagine that in this epoch of carnage and madness anyone could have been quite sane—could have done anything but set their teeth to endure. In the heart of this misery, however, men are everywhere seen laughing, carousing, enjoying, with at least as much merriment and rejoicing and keen interest in the life of the world as any which have accompanied the established security of the subsequent days.

For with the curiosity and violence here is also the elasticity of children, the power of putting away fear and accepting the present without foreboding. They sin, they repent, they sin again. They escape by a hair's-breadth from one calamity, and go gaily on their way till the next calamity comes. They take delight in feasting and love-making, and seeing and hearing new things, in splendor of apparel and the outward pageant of existence. Their acceptance of things as they come is intensified by the uncertainty of the things that are coming. To-day is never clouded by to-morrow, because to-morrow's existence is so problematical. They consequently never suffered from boredom or from life weariness. Sickness, insecurity, discomfort, brutality were part of the accepted order, unchallengable facts of human experience. In the midst of which were great openings also for happiness and love and laughter and the jolly adventure of a magic, amazing world.

Into this magic world, therefore, in the midtime of "that furious century," as this writer calls it, voyages our "Bohemian Ulysses" and his companions, with the object "to visit all Christian kingdoms and principalities, both spiritual and of this world, in German and in foreign lands; and especially would he to the Holy Grave of the dear lord St. James." They delighted especially in all cities in exhibiting feats of wrestling and of tournament, especially before the "comely ladies"; in spectacular display and feastings given in their honor; and in the exhibitions of relics of the Saints. At Brussels they are riotously entertained by the Duke of Burgundy; there "my lord led in all things a joyous and delectable life," says the annalist. They come to England from Calais, in a storm, having waited a fortnight for the winds to abate their fury: "And the sea suited my lord and his comrades so ill that they lay in the ship as though they were dead." Edward IV., "a passing comely, upright man," offers them in his "sea-washed citadel of Westminster" a "splendid dinner of fifty courses." They visit the shrine of St. Thomas at Canterbury and the shrine of Edward the Confessor, where they find marvellous relics, "four especially comfortable to their hearts: a girdle of Our Lady, a leg of St. George, one of the vessels wherein water turned to wine at the marriage of Cana, and the stone whereon Christ first put His foot on issuing from the Holy Sepulchre." Moreover, eight miles from London there was a crucifix that talked with men, "it is affirmed for certain." They found England "surpassingly rich in gold and silver"; a nation delighting in music; above all, with this agreeable custom, that all the ladies salute all strangers with a friendly kiss. The country is hilly and thick with woods, with great parks full of wild animals, heather, thickets, and reeds; and everywhere vast flocks of sheep, whose wool is England's staple export. Of the people, however, the description is unfavorable; they are "so crafty and treacherous that a stranger may not be sure of his life amongst them." "Never trust them," is the advice, "with howsoever submissive a knee they may bend before you." Voyaging from Poole Harbor in a storm, in which all the horses and men are violently sea-sick, they are pursued by "two great robber ships," but finally arrive safe at St. Malo, and embark cheerfully on the voyage through France and Spain for far-off Galicia. Spain especially seemed to them the end of all the world; where the priests had wives, and were ignorant of everything save the Ten Commandments alone, and each small town has its gallows for "hanging anyone thereon who stole a farthingsworth of goods"; and Christian and Jew and heathen could live more or less amicably side by side. They advance in a kind of running fight from town to town. "What do you come into our country for?" ask the aborigines. "We do not go into yours"; and (to enforce their logic) they shoot at the stranger with cross-bows. The Bohemians accept such incidents as all in the day's work; cheered and comforted by such sights as those at Burgos, of a wonder-working crucifix with a figure of flesh and blood which, on the very day of their arrival, had made sound a man that had the wildfire, a child that had both its legs broken, and a child that had been dead three days. Also, the nuns in the convents entertain them "with music and various delicious plays," and Turkish maidens dance before them "delectable dances." Portugal becomes frankly wonderland; filled with locusts, and dragons with forked tongues and wings like bats, "wherewith they could pursue men or animals for the space of two leagues," and many-colored scorpions "of the size of ordinary hunting dogs." Through all which hostility of men and things the stout voyagers pursue their way until they finally achieve that famous "tomb of St. James" in the mountains, which is the goal of all their wanderings. And, having come so far, they are seen at last on "Capo Finis Terrae," the end of all the land, when they behold, turned to stone, the very vessel from which Christ and our lady disembarked when they came there to found, in Her honor, the Church of the "Stella Obscura." They tell each other stories fearfully, as they gaze on that limitless waste of waters, of the terrors and judgments which had fallen upon all who had essayed to penetrate its mysteries. It still defied—for a few more years only—those who would sail beyond the sunset. From this headland, says the annalist, "one sees not aught anywhither save sky and water; and men say that the sea is there so troubled that none may sail upon it, nor know they what may be beyond." "The end of it no one knoweth, save God alone."

So they turned back, through Spain and Italy, in many surprising and delightful adventures, at the last to achieve Bohemia again; provided henceforth with an amazing store of knowledge and remembrance to beguile the long winter nights at home. It is a voyage through the European twilight; just before the coming of the dawn. That twilight is still possessed with a mystery and enchantment, strange shapes and colors, which are to vanish before the full light of day. Certainly few at the time could have hoped greatly for the future of mankind. "It is manifest," wrote Commynes, "that neither natural reason, neither knowledge, neither feare of God, neither love towards our neighbor, is sufficient to keepe us from using violence against others, from withholding other men's goods, nor from ravishing by all meenes possible that which appertaineth to others." "God alone" could "explain these things." They fared forward—undismayed.

Short Studies.

THE LITTLE PENSION.

At the break of day John Greggins turned out of his bed and went into the apartment that was kitchen and living room. The ballad-singer to whom John had given the night's shelter was also out of his sleep. Sitting on the sack of leaves that had been his bed, he was raking away the ashes that covered the seed of the fire. "Put down a few turf," said John, "and we'll have an early breakfast." The singer put turf round the kindlings, while John poured water into the kettle and hung it above the sods.

"What sort of a night did you put in by this hearthstone?" asked John.

"A good night," answered the ballad-singer. Then he said thoughtfully, "you've a lone cricket here that I'd like to marry to a cricket that's in a house in the County Clare." The singer was a low-sized fellow, round of limb, and round of body. He was barefooted, and wisps of hair fell across his eyes, that were restless, cunning, and humorous. Maurya, John's sister, heard the stir, and came down as the kettle was on the boil. A breakfast of bread and butter, tea and eggs, was made ready for the man of the house and the guest of the night. The ballad-singer ate without speaking; outside his songs he had but occasional words in Irish or English. When the meal was finished he put a ragged cap across his wisps of hair, and went to the door. "I must be shortening my road now, ma'am," said he, touching his cap to Maurya, "and I'm thankful to you for what you've bestowed on me." "Easy now," said John; "sure I'll be some of the way with you." He put on his hat, took his stick in hand, and went out with the ballad-singer. That was John Greggins's way; when the beggar, the ballad-singer, or the wandering musician, left his house, John Greggins would rise up and accompany them for miles on the road.

He lived in a place where the very crows were lonely. Perhaps you have no idea of the land where the stones have taken the places of the trees and hedges, where the shadow of a bare mountain is always on an empty lake, where the black of the bog runs into the fields, and where the whole uneven country is under the muffled Connemara sky. John Greggins had no root in the place. The fertile years of his life were passed in the British Army, and it was only since his retirement that he took up this abode with his sister. By a miracle of administration, the State maintained its relations with John Greggins, and once in three months the post came to the house with an instalment of his pension

He came down the mountain path with a good stride; his fine impetuous head held high. The ballad-singer, his eyes fixed on the stretch of the road, kept beside him with a gait that recalled the trot of a dog. "Lift up the music," said John. The singer raised his head and began "The County Mayo." The song was in Irish and this is by way of being its equivalent:—

"Now coming on Spring the days will be growing,
And after Saint Bride's Day my sail I will throw;
Since the thought has come to me I fain would be going
Till I stand in the middle of County Mayo!
The first of my days will be spent in Claremorris,
And in Balla down from it I'll have drinking and sport,
To Kiltimagh then I shall go on a visit,
And there, I can tell you, a month will be short."

John Greggins was waving his stick to the music when the pair came to the road. The singer went on with Raftery's song:—

"I solemnly swear that the heart in me rises
As the wind rises up or the mists break below,
When I think upon Carra and Gallen down from it,
The Bush of the Mile and the Plains of Mayo."

"Have you any more of that song?" asked John.

"I have," said the singer.

"Wasn't I lucky to come across you?" said John. "I never heard, at home or abroad, any more than you're after singing."

"There's a verse that has the name of every tree in Ireland, and there's another verse that has the name of every bird in Ireland, and there's another verse that has the name of every beast in Ireland."

"Raise it, raise it," said John. The singer began:—

"Killeadan's my village and every growth's in it."

Then the song ended. A hare had precipitated itself across the road ahead. The ballad-singer stopped on the road. "I'm going no farther along the road," he said. "I'm going to see a smith this side of the country." With that he crossed the ditch and went on a roving way. The little fellow had scruples about crossing the track of a hare.

John Greggins stood in the middle of the road. The sunlight was no longer lost in the lake, and it was visibly steeping itself in the bog. In the spacious light wide-winged birds were making cleanly shapes. John Greggins went on, the wander-song lilting itself:—

"I solemnly swear that the heart in me rises
As the wind rises up and the mists break below,
When I think upon Carra and Gallen down from it,
The Bush of the Mile and the Plains of Mayo!"

It was after Saint Bride's day. Indeed, it was the end of the month. This very day he could draw his pension if he presented himself at Crossgar post office. And Crossgar was only twenty miles ahead. John Greggins set off on his journey.

He went into many a house to redden his pipe and to talk with the people. His soul gave greeting to the big roan horses that were pulling the carts on the mountain road. At last he came to Molloy's, a notable house of refreshment, within an ass's gallop of the town of Crossgar.

John Greggins went in, placed himself near the hostess and took his bread and butter and his glass. At the cross-counter there was an isolated individual who was making a feast of a tumbler of porter.

"It will be a good season for lambs," John Greggins announced.

The individual at the upper counter peered around. He was a beggar, but he had an eleemosynary look never affected by the poor men of that part. He was blind by a dramatic convention.

"It won't be a good season for lambs," he said, with a lift in his cringing voice. "It won't be a good season for lambs. The frost will come, and the young lambs will die in the field."

John Greggins felt called upon to justify his optimism. "I'm not depending upon lambs," he said; "I can go into the town of Crossgar now and draw my little pension."

"And what have you the little pension from, may I ask?" said the beggar.

"I have my pension from the Government," said John. The beggar turned back to the counter and sipped the dregs of his glass. Meagre was the bag that hung across his back, a bag that would never stand upright. He spoke to Mrs. Molloy: "This poor man won't hear the unlucky word from me," he said.

"And why should there be an unlucky word for the decent man?" asked Mrs. Molloy.

"Stocks are down, ma'am," said the beggar. "Sure, you saw that yourself in the paper. The Government are at a great expense over a war, and I doubt if they'll keep up the pensions." He shuffled towards the door, but turned back to John. "I'm greatly afeared, my good man, that your pension days are over," he said. "Stocks are down." He went out, and for John Greggins it was as if he had drawn a damp cloth across the sun and had shaken the drizzling rain out of his bag.

"Who is that man?" asked John.

"He's a poor man, but he's a very knowledgable man," said the widow. "There's truth in what he said. I saw in the paper to-day that stocks were down."

"I think I'll make haste and get to the letter office. There's no harm in getting ahead of bad news," said John Greggins.

II.

The distance between Molloy's and the town of Crossgar was covered by a hurried march. The town was emptied—vacated, as it seemed to John Greggins's mind. He called to a boy who was minding an ass and cart, and asked to be informed of the way to the letter-office.

"Is it the letter-office that you want?" the boy asked in return.

"Ay, the letter-office," said John.

"It's the last house on the west side of the street," said the boy.

John Greggins crossed over to the west side, and headed down the street. He turned to the last house, and was confronted by a man who had his elbows along the top of the half-door. He presented a bald and massive head, and the appearance and reality of the hunched back.

"Is this the letter-office?" said John.

"The Academy of Correspondence," replied the man in a deep voice.

"And what beside that?"

"The Academy of Correspondence and the Depôt of Polite Letter-Writing."

"And has it anything to do with the payment of pensions?"

"The Academy does not fulfil the functions of a post office," said the hunchback. He opened the door and came out to John. "The Government Post Office is in the street abruting this," he said, indicating the place. "Remember the Academy of Correspondence. I am Dermott Mac Gilla Naeve, and my caligraphic skill is at your disposal."

"I'm obliged to you," said John, and without another word, gesture, or turning, he made for the post office. The scrutiny of his warrant gave John a few minutes' anxiety. The money was tendered him, however, and then the warrant was stamped and handed back. "Now, ma'am," said John, "I want to ask you a question. Will I be able to draw another draft of this pension at the end of the next quarter?" "Certainly," said the post-mistress, "or we'll have it sent to your address." "I heard the Government were in some hobble about money, and I thought maybe that they couldn't spare this. I'm obliged to them," said John. He stood still in the shop, meditating how he might express his gratitude to the Government. Then into his quickened brain came the thought of the Depôt of Polite Letter-Writing. He went across the street, and found the scribe before his door. "I want you to indite a letter for me," said John. Dermott Mac Gilla Naeve motioned him into the study. "This will be a particular letter. I want you to write to the Government headquarters." "I'll be glad of an outline of your case." "Well, it's like this," said John Greggins, and thereupon he set forth his relations to the State, and he elaborated his sense of obligation. To Dermott Mac Gilla Naeve this was material for artistic composition. He sat before the table, deep lines upon his great brow, and, after a while of labor and suspense, he produced the following:—

> "Most Honourable Sirs,—An Epistle from the Humble hand of one who desires to express his Obligation to your Magnanimity. The years of my Service are amply compensated by the Recompense which your Benevolence has bestowed, and your Bounty together with the Paucity of my Vocabulary render an adequate Expression of my Gratitude impossible. To proceed without Prolixity. I return due Thanks for this and former Favours, and with the deepest Veneration and Submission, I subscribe myself.—Yours to command,
>
> JOHN GREGGINS."

This was the composition which the scribe read to John Greggins. "It's powerful," was the comment made by his client. "My honorarium is one shilling," said Dermott Mac Gilla Naeve. "And more would not be begrudged you," said John Greggins. John's eyes went down the sheet, and answering words rose to his brain. "The Statement of my case surpasses Pecuniary Expenditure. Fit an envelope for it now, and address it to the Paymaster of the Imperial Army." Dermott Mac Gilla Naeve took up the pen and achieved an elaborately decorated superscription. He received the honorarium, and conducted John out of the Academy of Correspondence. Like one in whom the inner flame has been lit, John Greggins trod the street. It was as though an order had been presented to his soul, conferring on it the pride of articulation. Into the blaze of the sunset he walked, and he stood upon the bridge that knit the town to the width of the world. The mountains were illuminated, the river was richly flowing, and the bridge gave one the pride of human handiwork.

There were idlers on the bridge; some grouped at the parapet, and some playing pitch and toss in the middle. They seemed companions fit for John's high mood. He turned to them and said, "I gaze upon this flowing stream, and I acknowledge that never before or since, in this or any other country, kingdom, or climate, have I beheld a scene of such surpassing magnificence." The men, who had been absorbed in the game, straightened themselves up and regarded John. "Behold the bridge," he proceeded; "think of them that in the old, ancient days raised it in majesty and in glory to be a pattern and a credit to their posterity." Then said one of the idlers, "This is a fellow out of Munster who thinks we are still in Reading-made-easy." And another said with palpable irony, "Wouldn't you stand all night with your bare feet in the snow, to listen to him?" The tossed coin fell at John's feet; a gamester came forward to pick it up, and he said as he stooped, "It is easy knowing that before this the fellow never saw anything but the inside walls of a poor-house." His head was within tempting distance, and John gave it a knock with the short end of his stick. The mêlée that followed was conspicuous to the police. To relieve the tedium of the evening they sallied forth, and the one who was not aware of the way of escape fell into their hands. "We will put this down as a case of incitement," said the sergeant. "You may do that," said the young policeman, "for I saw him addressing the crowd and making very fierce gestures." There and then they decided to give John the cells for the night.

In the forenoon of the next day John Greggins took the road homeward. Silence was upon him like unto the silence beyond the trees and hedges, in the land of stones and shadows, where the very crows are lonely.

PADRAIC COLUM.

Present-Day Problems.

AEROPLANES AT OLYMPIA.

THE exhibition of flying machines now in progress at Olympia marks for the Britisher one of those big strides forward, one of those citadels occupied, which it is given to few generations and not many centuries to witness. "I could no more do it than fly" must pass from our stock of proverbial phrases, for though the number of men who have flown hardly requires two figures to indicate it, enough has been done to prove that the difficulty of constructing a machine that can be flown has been overcome, and that the use of it is but a question of bringing out the innate powers of man.

The appearance of the flying machine in the form of the aeroplane is the joint result of two kinds of progress in invention. The one is the devising of new means to meet conditions and requirements which may be new or old in themselves. To this class are due the form and disposition of the main sustaining surfaces, the arrangement and control of the horizontal and vertical rudders and the designing of many of the details. But the other class, though less attractive and self-assertive, is none the less important than the first, which is, indeed, subservient to it. It is the improvement of degree as distinguished from the improvement of difference, it is the improvement of quality in material, the reduction of weight in a machine of given efficiency, that render possible the very embodiment of the idea which provides the structure necessary to the application of the inventor's art. It had long been common knowledge that, given a surface and a current of air acting thereon, the surface could be made to sustain a considerable weight. The boy with his kite knew it, and everyone saw it in the flight of the birds. But to move the kite bird-like through the air was a problem that could not be solved, for the simple reason that an engine powerful enough to propel the kite was too heavy to be lifted by it. The demand for a light and powerful engine for automobiles was in the same direction, and the meeting of this need went far to supply that of the flying machine also. Even so, an internal combustion engine weighing 10 lbs. per horse power was considered very light until a few years ago. But now we are offered engines which may be loosely described as twice as light, and mechanical flight is un fait accompli. The kite can now be sustained by being driven against the air by a self-contained engine, and will carry a man at the same time.

Flying is, like bicycling, another attempt to improve on man's natural methods of locomotion. But at present its chances of being anything like as practical are by no means apparent. The bicycle can be stored almost anywhere, and can be started on any ordinary road. Not so the aeroplane or the dirigible balloon. They require sheds of large dimensions to accommodate them, and for the most part special facilities for "taking-off," while a strong breeze renders them intractable, or even wholly incapable. Still, the impossible has so often become the possible in the past that it would be foolish in the extreme to suppose that future developments will not clear away these difficulties.

The existence of a machine and a driver of proved capability being once realised, flying has come on with leaps and bounds, and the facts that the present exhibition was originally planned for the display of motor vehicles, and that a considerable proportion of the firms occupying stands are or were primarily engaged in the motor-car business are not to be neglected, though they may be easily over-rated. Flying has not displaced motoring yet; it is never likely to do so entirely; and probably it will not even outstrip it in popularity and utility.

It was not a pleasant experience, during the preparatory stage of the exhibition, to find that the language of Olympia is French. But it must be confessed that the tale of the motor-car is being repeated in connection with the aeroplane, and in the present case the old excuse for lagging behind our continental friends cannot be advanced. There is no Act of Parliament against flying, whatever may be the common law of trespass. It is highly desirable that the parallel shall not be maintained. The aeroplane is, as the automobile was, still in a crude state, but it is at least practicable. Then let our manufacturers take it for what it is worth as a basis for their work, instead of groping in the dark after new principles and retreading their rivals' ground, wasting many thousands of capital and prospective profits only to find—years later—that the conclusions embodied in present practice are so far correct.

So far as regards one phase of the flying machine, the designer has a guide that he is not likely to improve upon. In the bird, Nature has indicated the form of body which may be propelled through the air with the least resistance, and the outlines best adapted to the driving and sustaining surfaces. It is interesting to note that the vertical sections of the sustaining planes in the most practical exhibits at Olympia correspond fairly closely to those of the bird's wing. There is the same accentuation of curve towards the front and graduation towards the back. The Voisin, R.E.P., Howard Wright, Short Bros., and other planes all have it distinctly, but there is some reluctance to adopt the comparatively blunt, thick edge of the natural wing, though Breguet and T. W. K. Clarke & Co. go further in this direction than most. It has been thought that the flexibility of the rear edge of the wing was principally of use for propelling purposes, but there is a marked tendency to adopt this feature also where all the propulsion is effected by the usual blades or screw.

There are many broad questions yet to be discussed and investigated practically. Shall there be one main plane, or two or more? Nature evidently favors the monoplane, but Nature also adopts the flapping system of propulsion, which man finds less convenient than the rotary propeller. The Miesse Petrol Car Syndicate's "De la Hault" ornithoptere or orthopter is shown with two wings only, and these have a rotary rather than a reciprocating action. It is stated to have lifted itself some ten or twelve feet on several occasions. Lamplough & Sons' full-size model is more on accepted aeroplane lines, but has additional longitudinal planes, which are adapted to lift the machine by a feathering action. As a contrast, one has the R.E.P. and Weiss aeroplanes, which have single wings, and present a comparatively natural appearance. The power to rise and hover should be very useful for starting and stopping purposes, and in other ways. Most steamers still carry sails, the majority of motor bicycles are fitted with pedalling gear, and the ability to remain sustained independently of the propelling apparatus would seem to be a desirable feature in aeroplane construction.

Shall there be vertical planes, as in the Voisin, or none, as in the Wright Brothers' machine (several models of which are on view)? Such surfaces would seem to offer an unnecessary hold for the attacks of cross-currents of air, though the small fixed vertical rudder in the front of the Wright suggests that something may be necessary to prevent lateral drifting. Will one propeller be sufficient, or will two rotating in opposite directions be necessary to prevent the aeroplane being turned over laterally by the reaction, and should the propeller be in front or behind? All these different arrangements have proved to be more or less satisfactory. Some monoplanes have a single propeller in front, while the biplanes generally have two behind the wings, though the Voisin has only one. In the Howard Wright, the two propellers are arranged on concentric shafts, and turn in opposite directions, which appeals to one as a good compromise. Shall the machine have a tail, or shall it not? Shall it have a vertical rudder or a helicoidal, twisting motion to the planes, or independent ailerons? These and many other questions will form the subjects for flying talk for a long time to come, but the point for the industry to note is that they are none of them vital. There is nothing in these points to prevent their taking any machine that has really flown, as a model for their commercial output. Whether they shall experiment as well is another and a subsidiary consideration.

DOUGLAS LEECHMAN.

Letters from Abroad.

CLEARING THE AIR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At last the German Press seems to have found the right way of answering the excited statements of the British Press concerning Germany's shipbuilding. For several days the great majority of the papers maintained a cool indifference which, even if justified by facts, could possibly be regarded as artificial, and so increase suspicions instead of destroying them. Calm is always desirable unless it suggests the impression of a subterfuge to avoid unpleasant admissions. What was wanted were statements as to the real state of things, and they did not appear. Before the secretary of the Navy had, on the 18th of March, made his statements in the Committee of the Reichstag, no paper ventured to refute the British accusations by a plain and detailed exposition of what was in reality going on.

To-day the "Kölnische Zeitung," in a semi-official communication from Berlin, publishes an account of the state of the building and launching of men-of-war of "Dreadnought" dimensions. According to it, there are, together with the one just launched, five that are actually launched. These will not be finished before the summer of 1910. Four others are on the slips, but will not be finished before the summer of 1911, and four are on the Budget of this year, but have not even been taken in hand, so that at the earliest they will be finished in the summer or autumn of 1912. Then only will Germany have thirteen of these monsters. All suspicions about the speeding up of the building beyond the plan of the programme accepted by the Reichstag, are declared to have no foundation whatever. And the communiqué adds that if the Government have given orders for two of the ships to private firms it was exclusively for economical reasons. The Government wanted to help the firms to weather the present depression, and at the same time make use of the present fall in prices. But neither political nor military reasons decided the step.

Now this sounds rather reassuring, and if the Government will officially confirm it in an authoritative and unequivocal form, public opinion in England will surely calm down. It is not quite clear why Prince Bülow should have refused to appear before the Committee of the Reichstag and give the explanations asked for. His ways have lately been rather strange. But the decision of the majority of the Committee, in consequence of this refusal, to postpone the discussion of the naval Budget, and first discuss the Chancellor's Budget, may be taken as another sign of an aversion from giving the Government a too free hand in naval preparations.

The semi-official "Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung" has also a paragraph to-day denying any intention of transgressing the naval programme as voted, but it is not so detailed as that of the "Kölnische Zeitung."

Apart from the Social Democratic papers, which all over Germany stick unflinchingly to their strong opposition to the entire rivalry in naval armaments, the most sensible and hopeful utterance in regard to the question of an agreement re the naval programme is to be found in the "Kreuzzeitung" of to-day. The influential organ of the Prussian squirearchy declares frankly for a naval understanding with England. "It is not quite clear," it writes, "whether England has in fact approached us with definite offers in regard to restrictions in shipbuilding. But there is no possible doubt that the Reichstag, in concert with the German people, thinks that an agreement is wanted. We are glad to see that our article on the naval Budget has not only met with the approval of the Conservative Party, but reflects the general feeling of the Reichstag. The present naval programme must, of course, be carried out, but the fundamental condition must be that our battleships are not intended for aggressive purposes, but for the defence of our coasts, and must be kept up in a state suited to that purpose. Also, the enlargement of our fleet of cruisers which exhibit our flag in far-off seas must remain, but the provocative aspirations of the 'Flottenverein'—now happily becoming silent—at present must be energetically rejected. There is, then, a ground for meeting England, and since the Chancellor expressed in the autumn his goodwill in this respect, there is no reason for the Reichstag to get uneasy about the matter. It belongs now to the English to return to that state of trust without which a neighborly and friendly relationship is impossible."

This is not a great advance, but it is more than has been found in the Liberal and Radical Press. Even independent and otherwise advanced Liberal papers have at this opportunity again shown that uncertainty and irresolution they traditionally display when questions of foreign policy are at stake. This is an inheritance of the protracted political minority of the German middle classes. They never had a real foreign policy of their own, they too easily take up the catchwords given out by the Foreign Office, and, if none are vouchsafed, they pitifully waver in their judgment, and prefer to utter no opinion at all. It looks as if some were beginning to change, and that others would then follow. The Junkers have not the same fears. They know their own mind. They had already, twelve years ago, the courage to speak of the "graessliche Flotte." At that time it was no question of their paying taxes for the Navy. But now they are called upon, and so they are the first to speak out for an understanding with England. It is the financial side of the question that drives them to support a progressive movement. The only section that unreservedly stands for an unequivocal peace policy are the working classes.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Schoeneberg, Berlin, March 21st, 1909.

Communications.

THE TREASURY AND THE ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The cause of the recent debates in the House of Commons on the Naval Estimates should convince Liberals that in the course of the twenty years of reaction the control of the House of Commons over policy, through its control of expenditure, has been much weakened.

The manner of this weakening may be inferred from the report of the Select Committee on National Expenditure, which sat during last Parliament. A study of the evidence laid before the Committee by Sir R. Chalmers (then a Principal Clerk at the Treasury), the then Accountant-General of the Navy, and the then Comptroller and Auditor-General, will make it clear that (1) the Treasury exercise no very great control over the estimates of the Army and Navy, though jointly these two services account for half of our national expenditure; (2) that the Finance branch of the Admiralty under the Accountant-General of the Navy, on whom the Treasury seem deliberately to seek to fasten the responsibility for checking the expenditure of the Admiralty, can only exercise a moderate and limited control over the policy of the Department of which it is a part; (3) that the Comptroller and Auditor-General is primarily concerned, not with securing economy, but detecting irregularities in the appropriation of voted moneys administered by Departments, and that beyond this he can only keep an eye on incompetence on the part of officers of spending Departments, though apparently he had some field for his activities in this direction during the late South African war.

This being the situation, it is plain that the House of Commons is not served as well as it should be with a view to a successful handling of the Naval Estimates. It may be said that the relatively weak Departmental control of the Treasury over the Naval Estimates is compensated for by the fact of the special procedure adopted in the case of the Army and Navy Estimates—differentiating them from the Civil Service Estimates—under which they are specially considered by the Cabinet after being adjusted between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord and the Secretary for War; but the reply to this is (1) that the important work in connection with Estimates is not so much the determination of the total of the vote as the preliminary consideration of the new proposals advanced in any year involving additions to the standing part of the vote, and (2) that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is in a peculiar sense the executive officer of the House of Commons, has a right to have as much responsible advice of an expert character from the Treasury, being the Department of which he is the head, as the First Lord and the Secretary for War get from the Admiralty and the War Office respectively.

In other words, the Treasury ought to qualify itself to assist the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the House of Commons with expert advice on the Army and Navy estimates. It is a relatively small Department, and its upper staff is not as large as those of the Admiralty and War Office. There seems no reason why the Treasury should not be considerably strengthened by the creation of fresh branches to deal with the Army and Navy Estimates, and why there should not be a circulation between these branches and the financial departments of the War Office and Admiralty. In this way these branches in the spending Departments might be stiffened, and the Treasury acquire the expert knowledge which it lacks. At present the Treasury seems less disposed to employ experts than, e.g., the Education Department or the Local Government Board, which habitually employ medical experts, architects, and engineers in order to get independent advice on matters where the lay administrator is at a disadvantage.

It will be urged no doubt that any control which the Treasury could exercise, or help the House of Commons to exercise, would not touch matters of policy, and therefore would only be limited. It may be questioned, however, whether the distinction between matters of policy and matters of routine is not pushed too far in the Civil Service of this country, and whether the distinction between the consideration of "ends" and "means" is a distinction of kind. Moreover, it should not be forgotten that, under the current maxim that foreign questions and the Navy should be outside the region of party politics (which really means removed from the control of the House of Commons), the Admiralty and Foreign Office practically influence questions of policy to a large extent in their respective provinces, and that the contribution which they make to the "continuous policy" is likely to be anything but democratic. The very constitution of the Admiralty, in which the responsibility of the Parliamentary head is weakened in a way in which that of no other Minister is, by a joint responsibility vested in the naval lords, who can exercise it by threats of resignation, is only an argument for arming the House of Commons with new weapons against these oligarchic sea lords, which would give it equal authority in the eyes of those who are all for trusting the expert. Even, however, if the House of Commons and its servant the Treasury be kept off matters of policy, there are many important questions from a financial point of view which would be left within their jurisdiction. Thus it is conceivable that the orientation of our foreign policy might largely determine the distribution of our fleets in various parts of the world at any given time; but such questions as the adoption of a new type of man-of-war, the usefulness of which will be largely determined by reference to the standing factors in the problem of naval defence, and of immediate concentration thereon, to the neglect of other types, are such that the House of Commons with, and through, the Treasury and its head, should have a well-informed and influential opinion thereon.—Yours, &c.,

REFORMER.

March 23rd, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

ANATOLE FRANCE AND JOAN OF ARC.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In a recent number of THE NATION you published a letter from M. Anatole France with the preface of his new edition (the twenty-eighth) of his "Vie de Jeanne d'Arc." M. France, in his preface, remarked that he had paid attention to the criticisms of several distinguished French historians, and to my "laudable scruples about his references." I have now examined his new edition with care, and find that M. France has removed a very few mis-references while retaining the statements of fact which his authorities do not present, and even in some cases references which are erroneous. Two or three new notes attempt to justify the assertions of the text without success.

For the rest, even the most obvious slips of the pen (such as "Procès," Vol. II., p. 53, where "Procès," Vol. I., is meant) are left standing, and I cannot here give an idea of the number of passages in which statements derogatory to the heroine are made, and are supported by references to authorities which contain no such matter. As an example of want of care on an unimportant point, four references are given (Vol. I., p. 346, note 1) for a dispute between the people of Orleans and Raoul de Gaucourt, Governor of the town, on May 6th, 1429. Of the four authorities, one witness confessedly was not present, and speaks on hearsay information. The three other authorities cited, chroniclers, say not a word about this affair of May 6th. Two or three pages later (Vol. I., p. 353) two of these chroniclers are cited for an alleged dispute between the military and the citizens on May 7th, a thing which one of them does mention, and M. France appears to have used this evidence for May 7th, as support of the hearsay anecdote about May 6th. This is unimportant, and is merely an example of M. France's method. When he exhibits it in attributing to Dunois (with a reference) words which he never spoke, and to Jeanne (with references) speeches which only an imbecile could have made, and which the authorities cited do not contain, we can appreciate the value of the book.

In the "Revue Critique" of March 11th, M. Salomon Reinach writes: "Evidently M. France should read it" (my book, "The Maid of France") "pen in hand, and take account of criticisms which, though not too benevolent in tone, are indispensable for the revision of his book." M. Reinach himself contributes corrections, and hopes that these, with my own, "may make M. France's book as trustworthy as it is charming." Unhappily, M. France has not taken the advice of M. Reinach, and, if he did, the alleged facts on which he bases his estimate of the maid would vanish, and the book would need to be rewritten in a very different sense.

In his letter to you, M. France says that "his good faith is perfect." Never did I challenge it, or doubt it, but he might have taken the trouble to revise his book, and correct the astonishing misstatements which arise from a careless reading—with an unconscious bias—of the authorities.

Meanwhile, M. Reinach and I utter lonely voices crying in the wilderness. M. Gabriel Monod, the distinguished editor of the invaluable "Revue Historique," writes that M. France "unites the sagacious criticisms of the scholar with the tact and penetration of the psychologist, and the creative gift of the artist." As conclusive proof that M. Monod deceives himself, I may cite M. France (Vol. I., pp. 33, 34, 35). Here he maintains that Jeanne recognised St. Michael at his third appearance to her. "She could make no mistake, she knew him well, he was the patron of the Duchy of Bar. . . . She recognised the angel by his arms. . . ." For this fact he cites Jeanne's evidence in "Procès," Vol. I., p. 73, with four other passages, in all of which she refused to speak of the arms or dress or symbols of the appearance. In Vol. II., p. 278, M. France has found out that, in the passage cited by him as proof that Jeanne saw the angel in armor, she really declined to give any information at all.

Such is "the sagacious criticism of the scholar." As for "the tact and penetration of the psychologist," M. France, speaking as a psychologist, maintains that Jeanne's visions of the saints were modelled on the representations of the saints familiar to her in works of art. Thus, "she could make no mistake," she recognised St. Michael readily. He overlooks the fact that, according to Jeanne, she saw St. Michael "many times" ("multotiens") before she recognised him ("Procès," Vol I. p. 171). In the same way she did not recognise St. Margaret and St. Catherine for some time after their first appearances ("non ita cito") This is precisely the fact which does interest the psychologist. Jeanne was familiar, she said, with images and pictures of the saints, before which, in her childhood, she used to lay garlands of wild flowers. None the less she did not recognise her saints when she saw them; it follows that her fancy did not model them in their images, and here the psychologist is interested, while M. France says that she did recognise them from their images, and refers to authorities which merely say, as we discover, without correcting his error, that she refused to give any information.—Yours, &c.,

A. Lang.

8, Gibson Place, St. Andrews,
March 21st, 1909.

IMPERIALISM AND MILITARISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The statement in The Nation of to-day that I have raised my voice in favor of Imperialism and Militarism is a deliberate falsehood.—Yours, &c.,

Frederic Harrison.

The Athenæum, Pall Mall, S.W.
March 20th, 1909.

[Mr. Harrison's letter, in the form which he gives to it, deserves neither insertion nor reply. However, we concede it both these courtesies. Our criticism is justified by a score of phrases contained in one of the most sensational letters we have ever seen in the public Press. Mr. Harrison declared that the "tremendous navy" now being "hurried on" in Germany, and the "domineering ambitions" of her chiefs, threatened Europe with a new "war lord" comparable to Napoleon. Such an Empire, he argued, meant "inevitable" antagonism to the British Empire. The German Navy was specially meant to be the "spear-head" of a German invading army, to facilitate whose operations "every road, well, bridge, and smithy in the East of England and Scotland" had been "docketed in the German War Office." It was, therefore, "childish" to speak of "friendly relations" with Germany, or of the "domestic virtues" of the Fatherland. The two-Power standard having broken down, and the "total collapse of our Empire" being threatened, there was but one remedy, "the formation of an adequate land defence." Mr. Harrison did not "touch" the question whether this should be attained by "compulsory military general service," or merely by "stiffening" and expanding the Territorial Army. But while this military problem was being thought out, he suggested that talk about "industrial reorganisation" was "hollow" and "fine words about Retrenchment, Peace, and Brotherhood" "idle."—Ed., Nation.]

THE WAR DANGER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The fatalism which considers a war with Germany as "inevitable" appears to be a great danger at the present time. People who regard such a catastrophe with genuine horror and dread—as they may well do—yet appear to look upon its outbreak sooner or later as certain and necessary. There are probably a few in both countries who really desire the outbreak of this war. These can only be regarded as criminal lunatics. A trumpery tumult like the Massacre of St. Bartholomew would be a mere fleabite in comparison with this gigantic crime. All that is necessary is that the great mass of decent people in both countries should firmly resolve that the dreamed of Armageddon shall not take place. Surely they will do so. "Why didn't they stop the war?" asks the little boy of his grandfather in the ruined world at the end of Mr. Wells's novel. "It didn't never ought to have been begun," is the old man's reply. War is "bestialissima pazzia," "most bestial madness," Leonardo said. What some of us feel is that in a question of this kind Christianity itself is on trial. Imagine the survivors of the vast destruction which Mr. Wells has portrayed, as they began again the weary task of building up civilisation and order, contemptuously dismissing the Christian religion as useless! "It was not able to prevent this." But I do not believe the war will ever "be begun."—Yours, &c.,

R. L. Gales.

Wanborough, Guildford,
Refreshment Sunday, 1909.

THE PASSION FOR MATERIAL SECURITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION

Sir,—In the present mood of fear and bewilderment into which a section of our people have fallen, it appears to me to be increasingly plain that our Liberal spokesmen, in the Government and out of it, are being gravely disabled in their pleading for national dignity and international reasonableness by the fact that, almost without exception, they unite in demanding for our country absolute security—that is, absolute material security—on sea and land, as eagerly as the most timorous big navy man and conscriptionist among them. Obviously, if that idea of security is the one thing to be considered, the country is likeliest to trust the party that has least scruple in providing the Admirals and Generals with blank cheques; and surely if we Liberals have a function and are to ask a hearing at all in this business, what we need more than all else is an ideal and the courage to follow it. Economy is well; it is urgent; it is becoming more than ever imperative. But economy is not an ideal; it is a mere counsel of prudence which will never move the heart of a people. And until we see an ideal and seek it so as to take the risks of it—until we learn better to plead and to work for the substitution more and more of moral securities in place of material securities and recognise that good-will and good faith between nation and nation are better securities than a hundred "Dreadnoughts," and that we cannot have both—until we hold before our people an end that is more worthy of a people's strength than the mere saving of its own skin, we shall be still at the mercy of the coward and the bully among us, and must in the end submit to their counsels of terror.

I should be glad if you would allow me to recall, in these days of our need, a voice which was not many years ago a prophet-voice to some of the people of England. In his Address to the Free Church Federation at Sheffield in 1900, Rev. Dr. McKennal of Bowden said:—

"The hardest lesson we have to learn is that a nation which would fulfil the perfect law of Christ may have to give its life for its testimony. For many years the thought has pressed upon me that if England is to fulfil her noblest destiny, she may be called to be a sacrificial nation. And I have had the dream that the sacrifice might be in the cause of peace. If England, in the plentitude of her power, should lay down every weapon of a carnal warfare, disband her armies, call her fleets from the sea, throw open her ports, and trust for her continual existence only to the service she could render to the world, and the testimony she would bear to Christ, what would happen? I know not; and the doubt, the knowledge that any one who should speak of such a thing would not command a serious hearing, has made me a lonely man. But it comes again and again; the longing will not be repressed. It might be that Christ, whose 'finished work' is the trust of his people, would declare that the purpose of such a sacrifice is sufficient, that the example would be enough, and that the nation would continue to be living and strong in the gratitude of all peoples. But if otherwise, what then? Such a martyrdom would quicken the conscience of the world. I turn and read the description given us by the Second Isaiah of the 'remnant,' now become the whole nation, under the image of the suffering servant of the Lord—'despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; despised and esteemed not.' But he is also to be exalted and extolled to be very high.

"I am sure that, so long as the vision of a martyred nation appears absurd and impossible, there will never be a Christian nation. This also I believe, that until our advocates of peace fairly apprehend that a nation martyred for Christ's sake may be within the counsel of God, their advocacy will lack its final inspiration and victorious appeal.

"The end of the New Testament prophecy is—the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of Christ: but it is not certain that any nation now in existence will share in that consummation. We have no more reason for affirming the indefinite continuance of national life than for believing that we ourselves shall not die. In both cases the prospect of death brings with it the awe of judgment. It depends on the use any people make of the 'new occasions' which 'teach new duties,' on their readiness to follow 'Christ's bleeding feet,' 'toiling up new Calvaries ever with the Cross that turns not back,' whether their memory shall perish in merciful oblivion or their influence shall survive among the energies of the kingdom of God."—Yours, &c.,

JOHN D. SINCLAIR.

East United Free Church Manse,
Cluny, Aberdeenshire, March 24th, 1909.

"THE LOGIC OF WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your contributor who, in an article bearing the above title, wrote, last week, of "the fact that a limited Bill will not be accepted by the present House of Commons," must have been momentarily forgetful of recent Parliamentary history. Mr. Stanger's Bill was read a second time in the present House of Commons, and had a majority of 179 votes. The majority for Mr. G. Howard's unlimited Bill was but 35. It seems clear, therefore, that the preference given by Mrs. Fawcett (and by all the suffrage societies) to Bills which emancipate women on the same qualification as men, is shared by the present House of Commons.

It is not the House of Commons, but the present Government, which will not accept a Bill of that character, and which at the same time refuses to bring in a Bill of another character. The result will be that when this Government leaves office a Conservative Government (wiser in its generation) will introduce and pass a Women's Suffrage Bill that will really deserve the epithet "limited."—Yours, &c.,

CLEMENTINA BLACK.

Hampstead, March 24th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—To one who is a Liberal, a woman, and a Suffragist, the present bitterness between the Liberals and the Suffragists is most deplorable. It would be more deplorable still if the discussion over adult suffrage should further embitter the situation. Many women Suffragists, among whom I should wish to count myself, while they look forward to adult suffrage in the future, deprecate demanding it now for the reason that they do not believe the country would accept it, or any Government undertake the task of carrying it through. The fate of Mr. Howard's Bill in the House confirms this opinion. It did not win the support of the Government, and Sir Charles McLaren, a Liberal and a Suffragist, declared himself in favor of amendments which would annihilate the principle of "one woman one vote." There can be no doubt that the dread of the extra million women is very deeply rooted, and will take time and experience to conquer.

But now that Mr. Howard's Bill is shelved, must the Liberals persist in their non possumus attitude? If they are afraid that the mere abolition of the sex disqualification as it stands would increase the weight of property, a point which is at least doubtful, they have only to follow up Mr. Stanger's Bill by the provision, so often suggested, that husband and wife, when living together, should be registered as two distinct voters on the one monetary qualification. Speaking on my own responsibility only, it appears to me natural to hope that this would be accepted by the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, the body which has the honor to be under the presidency of Mrs. Fawcett, seeing that at the beginning of the session the committee of the Union actually outlined a clause to that effect, as a substitute for Mr. Howard's Bill. Many women Suffragists, indeed, would agree with me in welcoming this additional measure on its merits, as securing the best and fairest conditions attainable for the equal enfranchisement of women. This is one of the reasons why we are so anxious for the Liberals to undertake the work. On the other hand, the longer the present situation goes on the worse for Liberalism, and the worse for the chances at the General Election. We may be forced in the end to take the reform from the Tories, quite possibly on narrow property lines. We should be prepared to run this risk, trusting to redress the balance by a Liberal Bill later on. Further, the struggle between the militants and the Government will persist and increase, with all its regrettable features. It may be a question whether this struggle has done harm or good to the women's cause: there can be no question that it has done harm to the Government. The Government have lost hundreds of supporters, and not, it is safe to say, gained one. More than this, they have done much to weaken the real spring of Liberal work. How is it possible, for instance, to conduct a spirited campaign against a non-representative Second Chamber when the representation of women is denied? Deeper than all questions of temporary tactics lies the fact that the women's movement is, in its essence, a truly Liberal movement, an awakening among women to a sense of the claims, the duties, and the responsibilities of citizenship. It is on this sense, and this alone, that what is worthy in the State must rest. It should be the glory of Liberalism to welcome and lead this movement, and not allow precious enthusiasm to be driven into hostility and fanaticism.—Yours, &c.,

F. MELIAN STAWELL.

44, Westbourne Park Villas, London, W.
March 22nd, 1909.

THE REFORM OF THE DEATH DUTIES

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As an advocate of "clearer thinking," your correspondent, Mr. D. B. McLaren is hardly a success. Even if we allow for the printer's error, and assume that he intends to write that the "estate" pays the death duty, does he not fall into the loose manner of speech so current among Tariff Reformers who talk of cotton paying this and steel that duty when, as a matter of fact, it is the consumer who pays? Paying is the prerogative of persons, not things, and in the case of the death duties payment is ultimately made by the persons who succeed to their predecessor's wealth. All the dead man can have done is to decide out of whose share of his estate the claims of the State shall be met.

Assuming that in most cases the duties payable are taken into account by a testator, does not this support my previous argument that the graduation of the rates of succession duty, as well as of the estate duty, would tend to the subdivision of estates? If there were a higher rate of duty payable on one bequest of £100,000 than upon ten bequests of £10,000 each to ten separate beneficiaries, the desire to evade the higher rate would influence the mind of the testator.

My other point—the inequality of the present system by which the rates of succession and legacy duty vary according to degree of relationship, regardless of amount—may perhaps be better illustrated by taking the case of an intestacy. For instance, a woman who succeeds to £1,000 as sister and only next-of-kin of a deceased brother leaving exactly that amount, receives £980 net, while another woman, who succeeds to £1,000 as one of five sisters of a brother leaving £5,000, only receives £940 net. Surely the ability to pay is no greater in one case than the other, yet the burden is trebled in amount.

A Liberal Chancellor of the Exchequer has, in the graduation of the succession and legacy duty, an opportunity as great as Sir William Harcourt had in 1893. Evasion might be checked by an ad valorem stamp duty on voluntary transfers and deeds of gift, and, were it not for the fear that the funds so realised would, in the country's present mood, be sunk in armaments, one might foresee great possibilities of social reform, with a gradual approach to the wider and better distribution of wealth.—Yours, &c.,

SYDNEY P. TURNBULL.

Norbury, Scarborough,
March 23rd, 1909.

THE PROFITS AND INCOME INSURANCE COMPANY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be permitted to correct an inaccuracy which appeared in your issue of last Saturday under the heading "A Young Insurance Co."? The Legal Insurance Co., which was formed last year, did not take over the Profits and Income Insurance Company, but only the Profits Insurance Department of the Profits and Income. As regards all other departments, the Profits and Income Co. is continuing to transact business as formerly. As my attention has been drawn to the matter by some of our policy-holders, perhaps you will be good enough to remedy this in your next issue.

Thanking you in anticipation.—Yours, &c.,

ALEX. D. AUCHTERLONIE,
Acting Secretary.

Profits and Income Insurance Company, Limited,
9, Fleet Street, E.C.
March 22nd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On seeing the heading of your interesting article, "A Revolution in Fire Protection," in to-day's issue, I hoped to find what I have been long looking for—viz., an unsparing criticism of the abuses grown up with the development of insurance companies. It is an old saying that all roads lead to Rome. It might, with equal truth, be said that all social evils are traceable to bad landlords; for instance, insurance against fire, originally an economical mutual affair, has become, under the heavy weight of the landed interest, an oppressive money-making monopoly, whereby men like myself have to pay 12s. 6d. per cent. for that which can, under a municipal insurance, be obtained for 2s. 6d. May we hope, Sir, that you will deal with this much-needed social reform at an early date?—Yours, &c.,

JOHN LEWIS.

278 to 288, Oxford Street; 21 to 28 Holles Street,
London, W., March 20th, 1909.

MR. HOCKING AND THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to a paragraph appearing in THE NATION in reference to a paper which I read at the meetings of the Swansea Free Church Council. You say "Mr. Hocking hinted that all the leading newspapers were under Roman Catholic control or inspiration. Will Mr. Hocking name one such journal?" Would you not have been more just had you written asking for my exact words before making this charge? What I did urge was that, considering the number of Catholics in Great Britain, their doings, as it seemed to me, were inordinately reported in the public Press. But I was careful to say that I did not for a moment hint at any collusion between the editors of newspapers and the Roman Church; that I did not blame, but rather admired, Roman Catholics for seeing to it that their doings were so well reported, and I urged Protestants to be as wise as the Romanists in utilising the Press.

Seeing you have made reference to Dr. Lunn's attack upon me before waiting to see my reply, may I ask you to refer to the letters which appeared in the "Daily News" on Saturday last, and in the "Daily Chronicle" on Monday of the present week.

Personally, I should have thought THE NATION would have been the last paper to throw cold water upon any attempt to arouse attention concerning the necessity for the inspection of convents, but it seems I am mistaken.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH HOCKING.

Woodford Green, March 17th, 1909.

[We are glad to see that Mr. Hocking has somewhat reduced his earlier statements. As to the inspection of convents, we are entirely in favor of the State inspecting religious institutions where organised industrial work is done, for industrial purposes only. We are entirely against inspection for religious purposes.—ED., NATION.]

A DOUBT ABOUT THE "SERMON IN STONES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You deal very fairly with the fiscal question in your "Sermon in Stones," but aren't you claiming too much for the theory that imports are paid for by exports when you state that if the Government do not use Scandinavian granite our exports will be less? On a large scale of trade, the theory is, no doubt, approximately correct, but the process of exporting British goods to pay for foreign imports does not appear to be so automatic or inevitable that we must believe, with reference to the particular Government contract discussed in your sermon, that, if the granite were brought from Norway, British exports would be greater by the value of the imported granite than they would be if the granite were obtained at home. Does any British exporter believe that his chances of doing business abroad would be diminished in the slightest degree if the Government were to spend at home in future the half-million sterling they now pay annually to foreign contractors for imported goods which could be obtained in this country? I do not believe so.

Allow me to put another topical question as to the validity of this theory. The revised tariff which is shortly to be put into force in France will incidentally exclude British goods in several important lines, and particularly certain specialities of the Birmingham district, from the French markets altogether. This much is proved by the Board of Trade's inquiry among our manufacturers. According to the theory, the result of the revised tariff, therefore, will be that the French exports will be less, by the extent to which the increased duties are effective. But nobody in France says so, nor has such a thing yet been mentioned in this country, not even by the Chambers of Commerce in their representations to the Government authorities and business men in France, against the proposed increase in the tariff. If the theory is worth its face value, this argument would surely be worth mention.—Yours, &c.,

J. GRAHAM MURRAY.

53, Briarfield Avenue, Church End, Finchley,
March 16th, 1909.

[It is, of course, impossible to say what exports would fail to go abroad if the Government stopped foreign contracts, but if the theory of foreign exchange is "approximately correct," some exports would be diminished. The adjustment is brought about by slight changes in the general price-level at home and abroad respectively: if goods formerly bought abroad are now bought at home, there will be some rise in the home prices, some fall in the foreign prices, and this change, however slight, will cause some purchases which would have been made here by foreigners to be made abroad. Another explanation of the modus operandi of trade balances has regard to the price of "paper." Every French economist is aware that a tariff which reduces their imports will reduce their exports, and the fact that ordinary business men do not recognise this only means that they do not think accurately about business matters.—ED., NATION.]

THE MORTALITY OF CHINESE OPIUM SMOKERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Allow me to call the attention of your readers to a series of statistics prepared by Mr. Samuel B. Neill, actuary to the Chinese Mutual Insurance Society in Shanghai, showing the death rate amongst Chinese opium smokers. That society distinguishes between its smoking and its non-smoking clients, and it is found that the mortality amongst smokers is 41 per cent. in excess of expectations. It is also found that there is a larger mortality amongst smokers south of Foochau than amongst those to the north of that port. The mortality amongst the southern smokers is sixty-one per cent. in excess of the expectations, although the daily dose smoked is much smaller. Mr. Neill puts this down to tropical climate, but it has occurred to me that, whilst this may be one of the reasons, some of the smokers in the north may use the milder native drug. Inasmuch as insurance societies do not take opium sots, and Chinamen who can afford to insure their lives are fairly prosperous and well-fed, the percentage of deaths amongst opium smokers in Chinese society as a whole must be much higher. The clients of life insurance societies are what the apologists of the opium trade are pleased to call "moderate smokers." It is not a comfortable reflection that in one of our crown colonies we raise more than half the revenue from a monopoly which works such havoc with Chinese life; and in another colony a third of the revenue, and both these colonies lie within the tropics, where the devastating mischief to life is highest. Mencius holds up to contempt a man of T'sai, who fared sumptuously every day, and, when watched by his wife, was found to beg the sacrificial wine and food left over by the mourners who went forth to bury their dead outside the city gates. Is it not time that the Lugards and the Andersons and the Swettenhams of our crown colonies should cease to apologise for the unutterable meanness of living upon Chinese funerals?—Yours, &c.,

THOMAS G. SELBY.

22, Oaklands Road, Bromley.
March 19th, 1909

ON RUNNING DOWN THE ENGLISH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The things said by Mr. Lee and others concerning the superior efficiency of German shipbuilders compared with our own constitutes a grave business question. We have hitherto built more warships for foreign countries than all the rest of the world; but with this testimonial from past officers of the Admiralty, using the House of Commons as a sounding board, there can be no question but that German yards will secure some of these orders. It is not a wild estimate to say that one such warship will be secured by other countries during each year, and, taking the cost of the "Agamemnon" as an average, the loss to us would reach about £17,000,000 in ten years.—Yours, &c.,

SHIPOWNER.

London, March 24th.

LONDON UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Professor Foster, in his letter last week, speaks of those "whose whole idea of a University is that of an institution for holding examinations and granting degrees." It is not easy to see how anyone could form such a limited conception of a University generally; but there is no doubt that that was the "whole idea" of the University of London some years ago. And it is important to note that with this idea, and by means of it, a great amount of good work was done, and an immense improvement in matters of education was accomplished.

That London University has now enlarged its borders and assumed fresh functions is a matter for congratulation, but is no reason whatever either for belittling its past performances or for having that particular work done badly in future. And there does seem a tendency to try and make things a little easier for the students of various colleges. The old position was: "If you want our degrees you must acquire a certain amount of information, and satisfy us that you possess it." The new position seems to be: "If you want our degrees you must attend our classes, and take care not to annoy your professors."

Mr. Lake's view that teachers ought to examine their own pupils is almost childish in its simplicity. One might as well have the factory inspectors appointed by the owners of factories, or allow the Bisley riflemen to keep their own scores. One of the chief functions of examinations is to test the work of the teacher and to check his possible incompetence, laziness, or eccentricity. That there is a need of such tests seems hardly open to dispute. If anyone doubts it, let him take an inventory of the mental furniture of the average public-school boy, and he will see what happens when teachers are left to themselves.—Yours, &c.,

R. SPINDLER.

National Liberal Club,
March 23rd, 1909.

THE ETON HARE HUNT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent "C. S.'s" remarks are much to the point; but as no summary of Canon Lyttelton's letter can give an adequate idea of the extraordinary arguments to which the head master of Eton has been reduced in his defence of a sport for which, as himself a vegetarian, he can have no great liking, may I say that I shall be pleased to send a copy of the correspondence to any of your readers who care to see it.

I need hardly say that Canon Lyttelton was wholly mistaken in supposing that the Humanitarian League has neglected such matters as rabbit-coursing, pheasant-shooting, murderous millinery, cattle ships, and slaughter houses. On the contrary, we have for many years been busily denouncing the cruelties connected with each, and all, of the practices to which the head master refers.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY S. SALT.

Humanitarian League,
53, Chancery Lane, W.C.
March 25th, 1909.

Poetry.

MILTON AGONISTES.

"Due nemici ebbe, e l'uno e l'altro vinse."
CARDUCCI: "Sonnet on Luther."

Two mighty Caryatides upbore
The fabric of the Palace of his Foes.
One held a sceptre like a sword for blows
Lifted, and like a crown a mitre wore;

The other seemed like Comus, when the roar
Is up, and raging with his rout he goes,
His hair with vine-leaves tangled, and the rose,
That passes in its glory, and is no more.

About their marble girdles he enwound
The sinews of his Song;—athwart they flew,
And the roof rush'd in ruin to the ground.

But Death mix'd not this slayer with those he slew,
And still his Song has might to bind anew
Misrule and Licence, and to break when bound.

C. H. HERFORD.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE great number of literary anniversaries that belong to this year is, perhaps, the reason why several minor celebrities have been deprived of their quinquagesimal or centennial notice. To-day (Thursday), for instance, is the hundredth anniversary of the death of Anna Seward, but, as far as we have seen, nobody—not even Mr. E. V. Lucas, who thought her worth a stout volume, "A Swan and Her Friends," a couple of years ago—has done anything to celebrate the occasion. Yet among the "out-pensioners of Parnassus," to use Horace Walpole's happy phrase, Miss Seward has a comfortable place. Her literary baggage, though of huge extent, is not of the sort that can bear the passage of a hundred years. Johnson, it is true, said "there was not anything equal" to her description of the sea round the North Pole, in her ode on the death of Captain Cook, and Sir Walter Scott became her literary executor. But, in spite of Mr. Lucas's brave attempt, her poetical efforts are now neglected, and her interest lies in the glimpses of greater personages to be found in her very extensive correspondence. It was published in six volumes by Constable in 1811, and was a favorite book with Macaulay.

* * *

THIS year of centenaries also suggests a comparison between the books of 1809 and those of 1909. We are not yet in a position to take stock of the books that the present year will give us, but the reader of 1809, if he had no great cause for exultation, had at least little ground for complaint. In poetry he could cut the pages of that "miserable record of misplaced anger and indiscriminate acrimony," as, in a repentent fit, Byron called his "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." Or, were he disinclined from satire, he could read Campbell's "Gertrude of Wyoming." For readers of fiction Hannah More's "Cœlebs in Search of a Wife" and the first series of Maria Edgeworth's "Tales of Fashionable Life" were hot from the press. Those of a more reflective turn had the first numbers of Coleridge's "The Friend." Washington Irving's "Knickerbocker's History of New York" had just crossed the Atlantic. In German, Goethe's "Elective Affinities" and Schlegel's "Lectures on Dramatic Literature and Art" had just appeared; while readers of French could (if they were keen-sighted) see a new development of the historical novel in Chateaubriand's "Les Martyrs." Altogether not a bad year, though some of its near successors were to out-do it in brilliancy.

* * *

MR. G. M. TREVELYAN has followed up his brilliant book on "Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Republic" by a further volume telling the famous story of the Sicilian expedition. The book, we believe, will be published early in the autumn.

* * *

ANOTHER work on modern Italian history is Miss Helen Zimmern's translation of Signor de Cesare's "The Last Days of Papal Rome," which Messrs. Constable announce. Along with Ferrero and Villari, Signor de Cesare is a leader of the modern school of Italian historians. His new book covers the twenty years from 1850 to 1870, and narrates in full detail the struggle between Cavour and Garibaldi on the one hand, and the Papal Curia, backed by all the weight of Ultramontanism, on the other.

* * *

PROFESSOR A. C. BRADLEY'S "Oxford Lectures on Poetry," some particulars of which have already appeared in THE NATION, is now almost ready for publication. Among the contents is Dr. Bradley's inaugural lecture on "Poetry for Poetry's Sake," dealing with the heresy which would limit poetry to be merely an affair of form, having no connection with the deeper interests and problems of life.

> "In an age already inclined to shrink from those higher realms where poetry touches religion and philosophy," he says, "the formalist heresy encourages men to taste poetry as they would a fine wine, which has indeed an æsthetic value, but a small one. And then the natural man, finding an empty form, hurls into it the matter of cheap pathos, rancid sentiment, vulgar humor, bare lust, ravenous vanity—everything which, in Schiller's phrase, the form should extirpate, but which no mere form can extirpate."

* * *

"STUDIES in Mystical Religion" is the title of a work by Mr. Rufus M. Jones, which is intended as an introduction to a series of historical volumes treating of the development and spiritual environment of the Society of Friends, the religious body which Mr. Jones believes to have made a serious attempt to unite mystical religion with social endeavor. The coming book traces the history of mysticism from the "inward, free, and untrammelled type of religion which prevailed in the early period of the primitive Church" down to the time of the English Commonwealth. Together with an impatience of dogma, an inclination to turn for some sort of guidance to the great mystics is one of the notes of religious thought in the present generation. The work is to be published by Messrs. Macmillan.

* * *

ANOTHER book to come from the same publishers is a collected edition of the "Poems and Sonnets" of Louise Chandler Moulton. It will contain a biographical sketch by Miss Harriet Prescott Spofford, and an appreciation of Mrs. Moulton's verse, embodying some of the notable tributes paid her by her contemporaries. Browning wrote to her saying that he had read her poems "with flowers before his eyes, music in his ears, and thoughts across his brain," while Mr. Thomas Hardy spoke of them as "things filled with the supreme quality of emotion."

* * *

RUMOR has it that Mrs. Humphry Ward has written a new novel, called "Robert Elsmere Twenty Years After," which will be published in the autumn. The new book is presumably a sequel to "Robert Elsmere," which first appeared in 1888, and owed its amazing vogue very largely to Mr. Gladstone's review in the "Nineteenth Century."

* * *

THE death of Dr. James Hutchison Stirling on Friday last put an end to a career of great industry and versatility. Dr. Stirling was a close student of science, but he also wrote poetry and criticism, though he won distinction chiefly as a metaphysician. The work by which he is best known, "The Secret of Hegel," was often said to belie its title, but no writer has yet put Hegel's philosophy in a form easy to be understood by readers without philosophical training. Dr. Stirling's analysis of Sir William Hamilton's theory of perception was published in the same year as John Stuart Mill's "Examination," and both works did much to countermine the influence of the Scottish philosopher. Another death of the week is that of Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, whose essays on Continental affairs had an appreciable influence upon English foreign policy. He was the friend of Newman and Döllinger, and associated with Lord Acton in the "Home and Foreign Review," then the organ of Liberal catholicism.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Love Letters of Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh." Edited by Alexander Carlyle. (Lane. 2 vols. 25s. net.)

"Shelley." By Francis Thompson. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. George Wyndham. (Burns & Oates. 2s. 6d.)

"A History of Architectural Development." By F. M. Simpson. Vol. II. "Medieval." (Longmans. 21s. net.)

"Paul Verlaine: His Life—His Work." By Edmond Lepelletier. Translated by E. M. Lang. (Werner Laurie. 21s. net.)

"Napoleon's Marshals." By R. P. Dunn-Pattison. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Lausanne." Painted by J. and M. Hardwicke Lewis. Described by Francis Gribble. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Principal Story: A Memoir." By His Daughters. (Maclehose. 10s. 6d. net.)

"A History of English Law." By W. S. Holdsworth (Methuen. Vols. II. and III. 10s. 6d. net each.)

"The Blue Bird." A Fairy Play in Five Acts. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Christian Doctrine of God." By W. N. Clarke, D.D. (T. & T. Clark. 10s. 6d.)

"The Valley of Shadows." By Francis Grierson. (Constable. 6s. net.)

"Little Devil Doubt." By Oliver Onions. (Murray. 6s.)

"Les Heures Claires." Poèmes. Par Emile Verhaeren. (Paris: Mercure de France. 3fr. 50.)

"La Naissance de l'Intelligence." Par Georges Bohn. Bibliothèque de Philosophie Scientifique. (Paris: Flammarion. 3fr. 50.)

"Le Mariage de Mademoiselle Gimel." Roman. Par René Bazin. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE SECRET OF THE SANGRAAL.*

THE "Letters of Junius" have ceased to interest any but the most devoted specialists; the question as to the identity of the Man with the Iron Mask has become a signal for flight, like to the rising of a dull speaker in the House of Commons; the origin of the Rosicrucians is no longer an absorbing topic; but the great Legend of the Holy Graal still remains enchanting, enigmatic, vital. From one point of view, indeed, its vitality may be thought excessive; it is not long since a band of enthusiasts "discovered" a glass saucer—a late forgery—at Glastonbury, and proceeded to surround their toy with a tinsel halo of sham miracles, preposterous visions, and shoddy myths, believing, or thinking that they believed, their bit of blue glass to be the Holy Vessel which Galahad bore to Sarras. Still, this sorry tale is a witness, after its kind, to the persistent life of the high romance of the Graal, which inspired Hawker, which inspired Tennyson, which has given rise to theories innumerable, which has caused the well-known mystic and student of mysticism, Mr. A. E. Waite, to devote upwards of seven hundred pages to a treatise on "The Hidden Church of the Holy Graal."

Mr. Waite's sub-title intimates that the "Legends and Symbolism" of the Holy Graal are considered "in their Affinity with certain Mysteries of Initiation and other Traces of a Secret Tradition in Christian Times," and these words intimate the nature of the thesis which is enforced in this entrancing book. It would be as well to state, before proceeding to deal with this especial thesis, that the book is one which no lover of romance, of our old literature, of the Celtic spirit, or, more particularly, of the Graal Legend can afford to leave unread. Be the author's theories and doctrines what they may, his book is a conspectus, as it were, of the whole subject, and stands alone as a magazine of information concerning the Sangraal. The reader may agree with Mr. Waite or disagree with him, according to his conceptions of the laws of evidence; at all events, he will find all the materials significant to the problem laid before him in this encyclopædic treatise.

So far as the writer is aware, the "argument of the Graal" began in the nineteenth century. Before that time our fathers presumably accepted the tale as a legend, probably as "a monkish legend"—a phrase which would close any discussion, or, rather, would indicate that there was nothing to discuss. Warton had heard of a Welsh manuscript, but did not know that this was merely a translation, with variants, of the French "Queste" the romance which tells the history of Galahad. But from about the middle of the nineteenth century ample amendment has been made for previous neglect in this matter, and for the last thirty years the subject has been one of eager curiosity and much painstaking and elaborate research. To begin with, there are the wholly ridiculous theories which may be swept at once from the field. Such a theory, it is to be feared, is that expounded by Dr. Sebastian Evans, author of "In Quest of the Holy Graal." This book, ingenious and perverse to the last degree, makes the whole legend a political allegory of the reign of King John. The "Rich Fisher" is the Pope, "King Pelles" the Abbot of Citeaux, Galahad St. Francis of Assisi, Percival St. Dominic, and Lancelot Simon de Montfort the elder. The "withdrawal of the Graal," according to Dr. Evans, signifies the interdict under which the English Church was laid by the Pope. The ingenuity displayed in this treatise is wonderful; there are many and weighty reasons which make Dr. Evans's thesis quite intolerable, the chief of these reasons being that the Graal legend is a story of final loss; whereas the Interdict was removed after a few years. From a different point of view, Professor Rhys, of Oxford, has confounded understanding even more effectually than Dr. Evans, who, it must be said in all fairness, is the author of a beautiful version of one of the romances: "The High History of the Holy Graal." Professor Rhys takes his stand with the "Pagans"; with those who hold that the legend is essentially pre-Christian, and that the Christian "fetichism," which found its way into the story in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, may be set aside as an unimportant disfigurement. Now there are undoubtedly pagan elements in the Graal complex; but the case of a man who reads, say, the "Queste," more especially the Passing of Galahad, and then decides that the Christian element is negligible, is analogous to the case of one who should view Lincoln Cathedral and deplore the corruption of Roman architecture by nonsensical Gothic ornament. But Professor Rhys is not content with asserting the essential paganism of the Graal legend; he has seriously informed the world that Merlin is a sun-god, and that Galahad is a sun-hero. And he explains Galahad's purity by stating that "these sun-gods" grew very quickly. Cuchullain, he says, was a tried warrior at seven. When the myths were turned into romances, the ages were normalised, but no love stories were invented. It is as if one were to explain the magic of Homer by an example of a non-existent rule in an imaginary science, wrongly worked out. Then there is the Templar theory, for which no real evidence has ever been produced; there is the Albigensian theory, which is frankly nonsensical; there is the doctrine that the Graal legend somehow or other came from the East; there is the thesis that the Anglo-Norman romance-writers made up the whole story out of their own heads; there is the "moderate paganism" of Mr. Alfred Nutt, who, it may be said, regards the romances as a collection of pre-Christian myths draped in the fashion of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Finally, there is the theory, propounded with much charm and elaboration, by Mr. A. E. Waite.

It is impossible in the space of a brief article to give a competent account of Mr. Waite's very subtle theory. As has been noted, allusion is made on the title page of the book to "traces of a Secret Tradition in Christian Times"; and in the text itself such phrases as "secret doctrine," "secret Church," and "secret school" occur more or less frequently. On the other hand, the author formally defines the Graal literature as "the spiritual emotion of the Church expressed in romance"; and on the whole, it may be concluded that he does not wish such phrases as "secret Church" and "secret school" to be taken in their literal sense. For this we may be thankful, since nothing can be more certain than the proposition that Christianity never possessed anything resembling a "school" or "society" of esoteric initiates. It possessed from the beginning, and possesses still, members of different grades of intelligence, perception, and sanctity. The mind of St. Thomas Aquinas was on an infinitely higher level than the minds of most of those who sing his "Lauda Syon" and "Pange Lingua," and St. Francis of Assisi rose to heights of holiness which not one man in a million can hope to attain. But "secret school" in Christianity there never was, nor ever can be: and all theories on the other side are on an intellectual level with the doctrine of those who make the gibberish of the "Pistis Sophia" their Gospel, and imagine that the confused and troubled dream, or nightmare, of the Gnosis is the veritable Christianity. Taking Mr. Waite's theory, then, on its most favorable construction, we can assent heartily: the Graal literature is the imagination of the medieval church working on the highest matter of the faith, on that sacrament which Coleridge said was not a part of Christianity, but Christianity itself. The period of the romances—1170-1250—was the time of the Church's glorious manifestation; it was the time when St. Francis showed the world the miracle of his life, when the sombre, grandiose Norman architecture was wonderfully transmuted into the exquisite beauty of "Early English," when the philosophy of the schools reached its heights of thought, when the doctrine of the Eucharist was expressed in terms of the logical understanding. And lest the formal definition of the schools should prove too formal, too arid, too narrow, there was given to the world a great memorial and image of the sacramental mysteries in terms of the romantic imagination, in the legend of the Graal. A metaphysician once wrote that final truth is to be sought rather in poetry than in philosophy; so, perhaps, it may be said that Eucharistic doctrine is more perfectly expressed in the Graal romances than in the definition of the council. It is to be regretted, perhaps, that Mr. Waite has burdened his book with analogies between the Graal mythos and the theosophy of the Cabala, the conjectured doctrine of "spiritual alchemy," the initiations of Craft Masonry, and the eighteenth century ceremonial of "Templar Masonry." These things are scarcely pertinent to the Graal; and the attempt to identify the Graal talismans with certain of the Tarot cards is, in the opinion of the present writer, an attempt to show an etymological connection between "deva" and "devil."

* "The Hidden Church of the Holy Graal." By A. E. Waite. Rebman. 12s. 6d. net.

On the whole, however, Mr. Waite's doctrine is to be accepted—as far as it goes. The Graal story is the Christian imagination taking the shape of romance—so far it is possible to follow the author. It is not possible, however, to agree with him in his theory of the "material" origins of the Legend. Mr. Waite would seem to imply that pre-Christian stories about a miraculous feeding vessel survived unaltered, in their primitive paganism, to the twelfth century, when these tales were "taken over," as he says, by the romance writers. And in saying this he virtually affirms that Celtic Christianity—an extraordinary product, differentiated in many ways from other forms of the Christian religion—had no influence whatever on the Celtic mind. For him, it would appear, the wonderful and romantic fervor of the Celtic saints is for nothing, the imagination of Celtic Christianity is for nothing, its art is for nothing, its legend is for nothing. On a priori grounds such a theory is highly improbable; if recourse is had to evidence, it is seen to be absolutely untenable. It seems advisable, therefore, to set down a thesis which is absolutely opposed to Mr. Waite's theory. The Graal mythos, let it be said, derives from two sources, which, in the eleventh century, had become moulded into one.

In the first place, the Celtic families, the Celtic tribes, the Celtic nations, possessed palladia—sacred objects—to which extraordinary sanctity and importance were attributed. "Healing stones" are in use to-day in the Highlands of Scotland, they were used in Breconshire forty or fifty years ago, and there is reason to suppose that they are used in Wales still. The "Luck of Eden Hall"—a gift from fairyland—illustrates another aspect of the palladium, for on its safe preservation the prosperity of its owners is supposed to depend. In most cases, perhaps in all, these talismans were hereditary, and in some instances the "miracle"—whatever it was—had to be performed by the hereditary keeper himself, he being evidently regarded as the appointed priest of the palladium. Naturally enough, the talisman passed into mythology, into the underworld, into the world of sheer enchantment, and those interested in such matters may consult the notes to the "Mabinogion," where a list of the "Thirteen Precious Things of the Island of Britain" may be found. There were Horns of Liquor never to be exhausted, Baskets which multiplied food a hundredfold, Caldrons which would only boil for a brave man, and one great Caldron of Inspiration and Wisdom and Bardic Grace: and in this last instance, it will be seen, we have already left behind the region of material feasts and bodily advantages. Now, anyone who turns to Celtic Hagiology will see that the extraordinary powers and virtues ascribed by the pagan Celts to their palladia were transferred to certain sacred objects of the Celtic Church, Books, bells, croziers, altars were venerated in a manner unknown to the rest of Christendom, each object had its hereditary keeper, a collateral descendant of the saint, and certain of these talismans are still in the possession of their keepers—after a period of thirteen hundred years. Formerly these talismans went with the tribe to battle; they were surrounded with rigid "tabus"; the unauthorised person who so much as looked on them might be stricken with blindness or death—so far was the ritual of these relics remote from the ritual of the Roman Church, which has always exposed its precious things to the devotion of all men. Now, it is to be conjectured that among the British Celts—perhaps in one tribe—one of these relics rose to pre-eminence above all others; it was probably the altar of St. David, called "the gift from heaven," "the mystic altar," in quo dominicum jacebat corpus. On this relic, we may conclude by analogy, the whole prosperity of Britain was supposed to depend: an allusion in Geoffrey of Monmouth makes the disappearance of certain holy objects coincide with the flight and death of Cadwaladr the Blessed, and the ruin of the Celtic Church and State; when these return with Cadwaladr they will restore all things. And Cadwaladr (or Catgualatyr) is Galahad, and the mystic altar is the Graal which he bore away to Sarras, the spiritual place.

Such in rough outline was, in all probability, the Celtic story which existed c. 1100: it was "married," after 1130-40, to the growing cultus of the Precious Blood, to certain legends of Glastonbury; it was decorated with details from apocryphal gospels, from missionary legends, from the Prester John mythos, from the tale of the Earthly Paradise, from every source available. And, finally, it received the consecration of that "spiritual emotion" of which Mr. Waite tells us: the Legend of Cadwaladr and the Altar was transformed into the Romance of Galahad and the Holy Vessel of the Graal.

A. M.

THE BAGHDAD RAILWAY.*

The principal object for which the journey recorded in this book was undertaken is described by its author to be "to endeavor to discover what Germany has to gain by construction of the railway, and what England stands to lose." His conclusion is that Germany has much to gain by it and much to lose. She will gain by furnishing material for the construction, obtain a footing in markets now small "but potentially great," and make large profits on construction. He subjects the German Convention with the Turkish Government to a severe but fair criticism, and shows that the Concessionaires have made an excellent bargain for themselves and a hard one for Turkey. The present writer is not disposed to quarrel with this conclusion. If the Anglo-French Group which endeavored to obtain the Concession had succeeded, their bargain would probably have been equally hard. Mr. Fraser carefully analyses it, so far as the first section is concerned, and proves his case. The railway to Baghdad is to be made in sections of two hundred kilometres each. When the arrangement for the first section, which extends from Konia to Eregli, was made, everyone saw that it was ludicrously profitable. Turkey issued a loan of 54 million francs, and the company floated the bonds, received the proceeds and with them had to build the section. The loan was floated at 86.40, and realised £1,868,000. This was to pay for the construction of 200 kilometres, or 125 miles, and was, therefore, at the rate of £14,944 per mile. Mr. Fraser suggests that the actual cost did not reach £5,000 a mile, and, considering the nature of the ground through which the section runs, he is probably right. Everyone who examined the project at the time recognised that the price paid by Turkey was outrageously high. It was believed that the bakshish which had to be paid in order to obtain the concession was enormous, and common report alleged that the Concessionaires hoped, out of the large profits which accrued to them from this first section, to recoup their bribes. There was nothing abnormal in such a suggestion. Concessions in Turkey were never to be had without bribing officials all round, the heaviest amounts going to the Palace. The Germans, however, put forward another explanation, which, in presence of Mr. Fraser's statements from his own experience, puts another aspect of the case. They fully admitted that large profits would be made on the first section, but added that they had to take the bad with the good, and that the next two sections could not be made for the fifty-four million francs per section. In the first a profit possibly over £1,000,000 was made. But, says Mr. Fraser, "section two promises a loss of something like the same sum, owing to the expenses of construction."

Unfortunately, the author's reflections on his own statement were written before he knew what was going to happen. He evidently entertained an opinion that was widely current even a year ago, that the Concessionaires, having pocketed the huge profit of section one, had no intention of touching number two. "In other words," says he, "the promoters of the Baghdad Railway Company, in order to proceed with the scheme, must disgorge the million and a quarter of profit already pocketed. This is more than human flesh and blood can be expected to do. Hence the halt at Boulgourlou for all these years." The concession was granted in March, 1903. Nine months were to be allowed for presentation, examination, and approval of plants to Bourgourlou, six miles beyond Eregli, and within two years from the approval of them the section was to be finished. This brings the period to 1906; the delay of "all these years" is, therefore, a mistake.

* "The Short Cut to India: The Record of a Journey along the Route of the Baghdad Railway." By David Fraser. Blackwood & Sons, Edinburgh and London. 12s. 6d. net.

Mr. Fraser gives a most interesting description of his journey over the second section, which is through the Taurus Mountains. He realises, as only a man can do who has been over the ground, what are the difficulties which will have to be overcome, and states that he has come to the conclusion that "every penny of £3,000,000 will be required for the building of this next section of the Baghdad Railway." As a matter of fact, considerable time was spent, not "lost," in making a careful examination of the mountain passes in and near the Cilician Gates. Finally, the Concessionaires judged it in their interest to construct four sections instead of one, a length of 840 kilometres, which would take the line across the Taurus through the plain of Adana, and across the Amanus range, and eastward to Helif. In this way, if the Turkish Government consented, the State bonds for the four sections would be available, so as to enable the profitable to be taken with the unprofitable. In June of last year the Government accepted the proposal, and in an additional Convention the parties stipulate that the four sections are to be completed within eight years.

The four new sections will take the railway as far as Helif, and when these are finished, the railway to Baghdad will be more than half built. Two sections of the four are easy of accomplishment. Those beyond Halif also will be comparatively easy. The author suggests that there are almost insurmountable difficulties between Baghdad and Bassorah, or wherever the railway is allowed to come out on the Persian Gulf. He gives various reasons why it is improbable that the railway can be made to pay. The most important, and it is a new objection, is that there is a sparsity of population along nearly the whole line, but certainly along the latter half of it, and that there will consequently be few passengers and little merchandise. The obvious answer is that in all countries railway lines have attracted population to settle in their neighborhood. Hitherto it has not been worth the while of industrious peasants to grow more than sufficed for their simple wants, because they could not get their produce to market. Indeed, as Mr. Fraser himself points out, the absence of security to life and property is largely the cause of the diminution in the population. The objection is a serious one; but when Mr. Fraser suggests that there are no people who can be induced to settle in the neighborhood, the present writer believes that he is wrong. Throughout many centuries the great plains of Southern Central Asia Minor have supplied a constant stream of immigrants to Asia Minor. All the evidence shows that while the Turkish population is of itself decreasing, its numbers have been, and are still, maintained by immigrants from the north-east. On the lands belonging to the Civil List in the Vilayet of Baghdad certain exemptions from taxation were wrongfully accorded to the tenants of the Sultan, and protection given to them which was not accorded to the peasants on other lands, with a result that, while such lands have lacked tenants, others are deserted. It is too soon to predict what the result of the Turkish Revolution of last July will be, but it may reasonably be hoped that protection to life and property will be granted to all, and that the immigration which has never ceased will considerably increase.

Mesopotamia and the other district through which the railway passes were able formerly to support a large population, and it may be confidently asserted that under improved conditions a large population will once again occupy the plains. Security and good government in India have made the increase in population one of the factors with which the Indian Government has to deal, and though it would be absurd to suppose that there will be a rapid rush to take up land in the neighborhood of the new railway, it may surely be hoped that the new means of taking produce to market and of making it worth the while of the peasant to cultivate his land, will cause an increase of the population.

As already stated, Mr. Fraser wished to show what Britain's gain or loss would be from the railway. At the present time the trade done by England with the population living in the countries through which the line passes, is as great probably as that done by all other nations combined. Mr. Fraser states that the commerce of Baghdad with abroad has an annual value of two and a half millions sterling, of which ninety per cent. is English and Indian. It has been alleged, though not by Mr. Fraser, that the Germans would give facilities to German merchants which they would refuse to British. It is not well that they should have the power to do so. It has been alleged also that the control of the Baghdad railway will give the Germans a preponderating influence in Asia Minor. When the concession was first granted, Russia vehemently protested against it, demanded, and obtained from the Porte, a promise that no concession should be given in the North-East of Asia Minor to other than Russian subjects. It is alleged, moreover, that British influence in the Persian Gulf, and even in India, may be affected by the Great Trunk line between Constantinople, Baghdad, and Bassorah. All these allegations have been made by those who oppose the construction of the railway. If they are true, it is in the interest of Great Britain that she should have a voice in the control of the railway. It is mischievous to oppose its construction on grounds like those which led Lord Palmerston to declare that the Suez Canal would never be built. As everyone knows, it is not only built, but used far more by British shipping than by any other. In like manner the Baghdad railway will be built, with our aid or without it. But our interests in the country through which it passes require that we should have a share in its control. The excellent bargain which Germany made for herself with the Turks was discussed some two or three weeks ago in the Turkish Chamber of Deputies. Some of the speakers denounced the conditions as unconscionable, but the Chamber agreed that it must be abided by. The feeling of the majority was apparently that, though the bargain was hard, the construction of the railway would be for the benefit of the country, and this feeling the present writer entirely shares. It only remains for us to add that while we differ on many points from the conclusions at which Mr. Fraser has arrived, we must say that his book is brightly written, profusely illustrated by good photographs, and is well worthy the attention of anyone who desires to know what is the actual, but terribly unsatisfactory, condition of Asia Minor.

ROMANTICISM AND ITS CRITICS.*

During the past two or three years Romanticism has been the theme of more critical discussion than was directed to it during the whole of the preceding fifty years. In so far as this springs from a legitimate literary interest, it is natural, and to be expected. The time has come when it ought to be possible to form an unbiassed judgment of the Romantic movement, to estimate, with some approach to confidence, the value of the works which it produced, and to examine the nature of the influence which it had upon the literature that succeeded. Moreover, biographical facts are now being retrieved and published which, though guessed at by most people, could hardly be openly dealt with at an earlier date without causing offence to the immediate descendants of those concerned. That the materials for a full history of the romantic movement are now accessible, is largely due to the labors of such assiduous students as M. Léon Séché. M. Séché has what a witty critic calls "la fureur de l'inédit." He has filled a dozen volumes with previously unpublished documents bearing upon the romantic school, often trivial, it is true, and often interesting to nobody except lovers of scandal, but many of them containing materials of decided value. His latest book gives a detailed account of the "Muse Française," the famous journal in which Hugo and Deschamps expounded the doctrines and

* "Le Cénacle de la Muse Française, 1823-1827." Par Léon Séché. Paris: Mercure de France. 3fr. 50.
"Histoire de la Littérature Française." Par Leo Claretie. Tome IV. "Le Dix-neuvième Siècle." Paris: Ollendorff. 7fr. 50.

ideals of the first Cénacle. Like M. Séché's former works it contains a mass of information, especially about the lesser characters in the movement, which materially helps our understanding of its earlier history.

But a great deal of the current criticism of Romanticism springs from a different, and far less disinterested, motive. The nationalist and clerical party has made the discovery that at bottom the romantic ideal is a democratic ideal, and for that reason is carrying on an acrimonious campaign against it. In its early revolt against the tyranny of the classical conventions and its early experiments in search of the picturesque, romanticism turned inevitably towards medievalism. The trappings of royalty and the poetry of Catholicism were splendid material for the cult of the glowing, dazzling adjective. But the movement that aimed at the revivifying of art and letters by bringing them into touch with the concrete life of the age, could not end there. Before the spectacle of democracy marshalling its ranks, the glories of the Middle Age seemed dim and irrecoverable, and the romantic poets, without leaving their true line of development, became modern and democratic. It is for this reason that in a country where literature has a more immediate bearing upon politics than with ourselves, men like M. Bourget and M. Barrès, who wish to restore the absolutism of the past, are making a deliberate attempt to discredit romanticism. It has been, such writers insist, an entirely mischievous influence, foreign in its origins and disturbing to the true current of French thought, a virus that may possibly be innocuous amid the fogs of England or the metaphysic-laden atmosphere of Germany, but destructive and poisonous when introduced into the bright and sparkling air of France. The notes of the French genius are clearness, order, balance, restraint, respect for traditions and avoidance of emphasis and exaggeration, and to all these qualities the intrusion of this foreign element has wrought untold harm. "Negative in everything," says M. Pierre Lasserre, one of the latest exponents of the school of M. Barrès, "it has striven to make itself the supreme affirmation, to call disorder liberty, confusion genius, instinct energy. It is the enthusiastic disorganisation of our civilised human nature."

All this sounds comically vieux jeu to-day. In the 'twenties and 'thirties such accusations were made with more show of reason. But they have all been refuted. The battle of romanticism has been fought and won. The works which it has produced are the standing memorials of its inspiration and of its consonance with the national genius. The France of MM. Bourget and Barrès is not such a flowering time of genius as to be able to throw stones at the France of Hugo and de Vigny, of Michelet and Sainte-Beuve. Could a survivor of the famous first night of "Hernani" at the Théâtre Français in 1830, read the diatribes of recent critics he would infallibly (were he a romantic, and therefore knowing his Shakespeare) quote Macbeth's lines to the ghost of Banquo:—

> "The times have been
> That, when the brains were out, the man would die,
> And there an end; but now they rise again . . .
> And push us from our stools."

There is little risk of the greatest writers in nineteenth century French literature being pushed from their stools by the present movement, but an attempt to discredit democratic ideas by depreciating and ridiculing the men who gave them currency deserves to be stigmatised in its true colors.

The two questions which reasonable criticism has to answer regarding the romantic school are—first, what was romanticism in its essence? and, second, what was the nature and extent of its influence upon the following age?

To the first of these questions there is a perplexing variety of answers. Duvergier de Hauranne, one of its early critics, defined it, as M. Leo Claretie reminds us in his solid and suggestive "History of French Literature," as "a disease like somnambulism or epilepsy." "By no means," says Stendhal, "romanticism is the art of presenting people with the literary works which, in the present state of their habits and beliefs, are capable of giving them the greatest possible pleasure. Classicism, on the contrary, presents them with the literature which gave the greatest possible pleasure to their great-grandfathers." M. Reybaud's immortal Jérôme Paturot, himself the one hundred and ninety-eighth genius of the romantic school, gave us his views upon romanticism and incidentally illustrated the confusion of its aims.

> "The moment had come for the grand style, the true style, the supreme style—a style at once ornate, caressing, and flashing—a style that included the azure of the skies, the varying hues of the painter's palette, the myriad fantasies of architecture, the warmth of love, the bitterness of jealousy, the placid smile of virtue, and all the hurricane of human passion. The literature we were about to create was to be strident, chivalrous, blue, green, crimson; deep and untroubled as the lake, serpentine as a Malay's creese, keen as a Toledo blade. It was to concentrate in itself the haughty pride of the Spanish grandee and the reckless folly of a mountebank. It was to have the height of Stamboul's minarets, and the width of Venice's marble pavements. It was to bring together Soliman and Faliero, the muezzin and the gondolier. It was to sing with the bird, whiten with the wave, become green with the leaf, ruminate with the ox, and neigh with the horse. In short, it was to give itself, with amazing effect, to all physical phenomena, to conquer, to dominate, and, if I may say so, to 'pulverise' Nature herself."

M. Lasserre piles up invectives which make us think that Jérôme Paturot has gone over into the enemy's camp. "Sensualisme des idées, métaphysique des émotions, matérialisme mystique, bestialité lyrique, ainsi pourrait-on définir la tare, disons mieux: la pourriture romantique de l'intelligence." A more sober critic defines it as "a literature in which the lyrical element predominates." The reader may make his own choice. Romanticism is almost as hard to define as poetry, but, like poetry also, we find little difficulty in recognising it when we see it. The truth is that to understand the meaning of romanticism we must adopt the distinction made by M. Emile Bourgeois in the latest volume of the "Cambridge Modern History," and draw a sharp line between the literary cotcrie of which M. Séché writes, and the revolution in the world of letters, not only French, but European, "under whose influence and amid whose results we are living to-day." The former produced great men, and did excellent service in widening the range and deepening the harmonies of French verse. Its discussions of local color and the grotesque in art, of enjambement and the variable caesura, were but ripples on a broader stream. In this deeper sense romanticism was a lesser Renaissance, a re-discovery of the world and of man. In England, in Germany, in Italy, as well as in France, there was a new spirit in the air, a new tendency in men's minds. They found that it was possible to look at art and nature, not as they appeared to the Greeks or Romans or to their own grandfathers, but as they appeared to themselves. "Jetons bas," said Hugo, "ce vieux plâtrage qui masque la façade de l'art: il n'y a ni règles ni modèles; ou plutôt il n'y a d'autres règles que les lois générales de la nature, qui planent sur l'art tout entier, et les lois spéciales qui pour chaque composition, résultent des conditions d'existence propres à chaque sujet." To-day this is the merest commonplace, but it came to Hugo and his fellows with all the charm of a new discovery, opening before them new avenues to enjoyment and quickening the creative spirit in an extraordinary degree.

It is, therefore, with the greater astonishment that we see a reactionary group attempting to prove that romanticism was nothing more than an irrational and frenzied individualism, and, in the name of nationalism, doing all they can to belittle one of the greatest epochs in literature.

When we attempt to estimate the present influence of romanticism, we find ourselves on more difficult ground. We are at a moment when naturalism, the daughter of romanticism, has died and left none to succeed her. Our literature is complex, disorganised, and tending to greater aloofness from life. It has grown more and more self-conscious and lost the élan and spontaneity of the romantic days. One thing, however, it still possesses which it owes to them. No one can deny that whatever else romanticism was, it was a liberating movement, an assertion of the rights of the individual. Whatever formula the literature of the immediate future may adopt, it cannot avoid being democratic. M. Leo Claretie deplores, what he calls, "la confusion démocratique des genres." But too great an insistence upon any system of classification would be no less an evil. The filiation of literary schools is never easy to determine, and to claim for any one of them a preponderating influence upon its successors is a great, though a common, mistake. As Malebranche saw all things in God, so your true romantic sees all things in romanticism.

WERNER LAURIE'S NEW BOOKS.

PAUL VERLAINE: His Life, His Work. A Biography of the famous French poet and the history of contemporary French literature and writers. By E. Lepelletier, Demy 8vo illustrated net 1 1 0

The Author of this book was at school with Verlaine, knew him intimately all his life, lent him money, procured him employment, and found publishers for his poems. He presents a graphic picture of the real Verlaine, and gives a wonderfully vivid criticism of his works.

M. Lepelletier's life of the master is not only a fascinating biography—it is practically a history of the chief French Literary movements of Verlaine's period, and throws a strong light upon contemporary Literature and writers.

The volume contains a number of exceedingly interesting illustrations and photographs.

THE COMING SCIENCE (Psychical Research). By Hereward Carrington. Author of "The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism." With an Introduction by James H. Hyslop, Ph.D., LL.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, net 7 6

FIGHTS FORGOTTEN. The History of some of the chief English and American prize fights. By Henry Sayers. Fully illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt net 6 0

EARLY CHRISTIAN HYMNS. By Daniel Joseph Donahoe. Translations of the verses of the most notable Latin writers of the early and middle ages. Crown 8vo net 6 0

HOROSCOPES AND HOW TO CAST THEM. A Book of Practical Astrology. By Comte C. de Saint Germain. 100 illustrations. Crown 8vo net 6 0

GENERAL LEE: Man and Soldier. By Thomas Nelson Page. With a Photogravure Portrait. Crown 8vo. net 6 0

ROADS TO RICHES. The Romance of Money Making. By Thornton Hall. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt net 3 6

TRAGEDIES OF THE MEDICI: A Muster Roll of Intrigue and Crime. By Edgcumbe Staley. With 52 illustrations and hand-coloured Photogravure Frontispiece. Cloth gilt, Demy 8vo, net 12 6

NIGHTS WITH THE GODS. A study of present-day social, religious, literary, and political features, clothed in the form of humorous criticism. By Emil Reich (Doctor Juris). Price 6 0

T. WERNER LAURIE, Clifford's Inn, London.

ENGLISH REVIEW

APRIL NUMBER READY MONDAY NEXT.

No. V. CONTENTS. PRICE 2s. 6d.

THOMAS HARDY -	London Nights (2 Poems)
EDWARD HUTTON -	The Messiah of Mont Amiata
ARNOLD BENNETT -	The Matador of the Five Towns
JOSEPH CONRAD -	Some Reminiscences V.
BARON IGNATZ VON ASCHENDROF -	The Nature of a Crime I.
STEPHEN REYNOLDS	The Holy Mountain I.

CRITICAL ATTITUDES.

EDWARD GARNETT -	"W. B. Yeats"
EDWARD THOMAS -	"William Morris"
EDGAR JEPHSON -	Liberal Mormonism
E.R. - - -	The Work of W. H. Hudson
Dr. LEVIN SCHÜCKING	The Novel in Germany
Dr. SIMON -	Capital Punishment in France

THE EDITORIAL WILL DEAL WITH THE NAVAL PANIC AND THE TERRITORIAL MOVEMENT.

Owing to the exigences of the American Copyright Act President Taft's article on his Judicial Decisions and on his Election cannot appear until the June Number, but he is contributing to the May Number of the ENGLISH REVIEW an article on the Panama Canal.

DUCKWORTH & CO., HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

ENGLISH REVIEW

THE CARLYLE LOVE-STORY.*

Mrs. Carlyle died in 1866—exactly forty-three years ago. Her husband outlived her by fifteen years, mourning her death, and pathetically recording all those poignant regrets for moments of indifference which every man feels who has lost a deeply loved being. But he had made James Anthony Froude his literary executor, and had entrusted a great mass of correspondence and other biographical matter to a man of fine literary sense, but given to the careless handling of documents, to hasty conclusions, and to the practice of supporting them with obstinacy, aided by an alluring flow of rhetoric. Among the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Froude, when brought face to face with the Carlyle papers, was the impression that Mrs. Carlyle had married beneath her in social status, and that every passionate word of this delicate, fluent, high-strung, sharp-tongued, sensitive woman was to be taken with absolute literalness. She once said: "I married for ambition. Carlyle has exceeded my highest dreams in that way, and—I am miserable." Ignoring a thousand endearing and passionate phrases, Froude accepted such utterances as reflecting her normal feeling about her marriage. Those who have weighed the subject carefully in all its bearings, and who have made intelligent allowances, realise that union was the best thing that could have happened to both these people, and that if their marriage was not exactly made in Heaven, it had a beautiful earthly significance. But this is another story that has little enough bearing upon the two charming volumes that Mr. John Lane has just published. They bring up the biographical material that surrounds the Carlyles—including only books that have been authorised by his family or executors—to some twenty-eight volumes. "The Gospel of Silence in thirty fine volumes," as Lord Morley once described it, has been supplemented by a commentary almost as long. Of all the books—lives, letters, reminiscences—we are inclined to give the first place to these volumes. They are the sweetest and most wholesome.

Edward Irving, meeting Carlyle in Edinburgh, in the days of his first literary struggles, proposed a walk to Haddington—sixteen miles away—to visit some friends. The friends were the widow of a doctor and her daughter Jane. They talked of books—Carlyle and the daughter—as many literary-minded lovers have done before and since. Carlyle undertook to guide Miss Welsh's reading; to lend her volumes from the University library; and so the correspondence opens in June, 1821, beginning with: "My dear friend," on his part, and a cool "Dear sir" on hers, after which Carlyle ventured for many a letter no further than "My dear Madam."

Mrs. Welsh looked on unsympathetically, and, in the beginning, her daughter was clearly only disposed to the most platonic relations with one whose genius she recognised at once, although Carlyle in this year (1822) had done nothing beyond a few encyclopædia articles and a translation of Legendre's "Elements of Geometry"; he was just beginning his tutorship to Charles Buller. Carlyle was in love from the very first letter. Miss Welsh's regard grew, woman-like, much more slowly. It is thus she writes to him in the January of that year:—

> "Falling in love and marrying like other misses, is quite out of the question. I have too little romance in my disposition ever to be in love with you, or any other man; and too much ever to marry without love. Were I a man, I would not wait till others find your worth to say in the face of the whole world, 'I admire this man, and choose him for my friend.' But I am a woman, Mr. Carlyle, and what is worse, a young woman. Weaknesses, timidity, and bondage are in the word—But enough of this. Why do you force me into such horrid explanations?"

One visit to Haddington that Carlyle made in a moment of enthusiasm turned out a failure. He was quietly repelled by mother and daughter, and for a whole year kept away, writing letters which exhorted Miss Welsh to literary effort on her own account, suggesting now a tragedy on Boadicea, now a novel, and now and again a joint book. "I am no poet, 'have no genius,'" he says in one letter; "I know it well, but I can learn to make words jingle whenever I think fit; and, by the blessing of Heaven, we two will try it now in concert."

Carlyle's passion grows with every letter, and in October he is writing that he does not believe that "there are three men in Edinburgh that have such a correspondence as I have. Heaven grant that I may long be so happy." By this time Miss Welsh has, in her turn, become an inspiring force, for she writes:—

> "It is with a feeling of regret you would scarcely give me credit for, that I see your days fleeting away unmarked by one struggle for immortality. Oh, if I had your talents, what a different use I would make of them!"

By November of this second year of courtship Carlyle had wrought himself to an enthusiasm that looked not merely into the beautiful eyes of his beloved, but also into her mind:—

> "If my own Scholar do not become one of the ornaments of her age and country, I am content to forfeit all my critical reputation for ever."

Then gradually love came to the woman as a sense of the man's worth and his clearly revealed intellectual powers grew upon her. Even before she counted herself definitely affianced to him—in January, 1825—she was able to write: "How often do your letters bring me comfort, dearest." From that point she became as ardent as her lover, and when Mrs. Montagu told her that she should tell Carlyle about her early affection for Edward Irving, the disclosure cost her acute mental anguish. On his side, Carlyle steadily gains serenity of mind as his work develops. "The Life of Schiller" is finished, and his translation of "Wilhelm Meister" also. Some measure of poverty is before them, but, as Miss Welsh says, "truly this poverty is a circumstance of which I need not to be any more warned, for I have long since looked it full in the face, and left it out in none of my calculations." Mr. Alexander Carlyle makes it quite clear, we think, that, unsatisfactory as was Mrs. Carlyle's health during her married life, she had a poor family history, and suffered from continuous bad health in her early years. "All the evidence," he says, "goes to prove that she was far healthier and happier after marriage than before it." Assuredly in that married life there was no lack of love on her side or on his. "Oh, my love, my dearest, always love me; I am richer with thee than the whole world could make me otherwise," she writes on one occasion. "Oh, my own darling husband, God keep you and bring you safe back to me," she writes on another, while to her husband's mother she says:—

> "You have others besides, and I have only him—only him in the whole wide world to love me and take care of me—poor little wretch that I am. Not but that numbers of people love me after their fashion, far more than I deserve; but then, his fashion is so different from theirs, and seems alone to suit the crotchety creature that I am."

"Carlyle and his wife live on beautiful terms," wrote Emerson on one occasion after a visit. That impression was endorsed by Mrs. Oliphant and by most visitors to Cheyne Row. The fervor of love letters written before marriage are, of course, no guarantee of the future happiness of the lovers, but Mr. Alexander Carlyle's notes and disclosures lead forcibly to the conclusion now firmly established, that in the records of the married lives of literary people, there have been but few unions so harmonious as that of Carlyle and his wife.

* "The Love Letters of Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh." Edited by Alexander Carlyle, M.A. With Numerous Illustrations. John Lane. 2 volumes. 24s.

HALF AND HALF.*

Mr. Ayscough's new novel, "Dromina," which we have been awaiting with interest since "Marotz" appeared, begins well. The household of The M'Morogh, who represents "a Celtic Royal House descended from at least sixteen of the Saxon Kings of England," enshrines genealogical glories which put to shame the ancestral claims of most of our upstart Royalties. Canon O'Hirlihy, however, who arrives at Dromina Castle one February morning in 1820 with the news of George III.'s death, is more concerned with "assaults on the empty purse" of The M'Morogh than with appreciating the heraldic designs, painted on the ceiling, "of the Irish Kings, the Scotch, the Spanish, and the Holy Roman Emperors from which his honour's self's descended":—

> "It was not long after Lady Day in Harvest," the inexorable priest reminded The M'Morogh, "that I came here to spake to

* "Dromina." By John Ayscough. J. W. Arrowsmith. 6s.

Mr. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

THE LIFE OF ADMIRAL SIR LEOPOLD McCLINTOCK,

The Great Arctic Explorer and Discoverer of the Fate of Franklin. By Sir CLEMENTS MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"Sir Clements's intimate acquaintance, too, with all the leading figures, both officers and men, who were engaged in the search has enabled him to give a gallery of pen portraits which does credit alike to his memory and his literary skill. As one of our leading geographers, he is admirably fitted to appraise at its true value the importance of the results achieved. And finally he is fortunate in having for the subject of his memoir a singularly lofty character."—The Times.

"No living sailor was so worthy to be the biographer of Sir Leopold McClintock as Sir Clements Markham, who himself holds an honoured place in the role of those who have added to our knowledge of the Polar Seas. Sir Clements Markham has written with much of the simplicity and reserve of the great explorer himself. He is a frank admirer of the subject of his biography, but never for a moment does he diverge from quiet narrative . . . it is an inspiring record of one who did his duty as he saw it, and found the path to fame by his own fine qualities of character."—The Westminster Gazette.

TWO ADMIRALS.

SIR FAIRFAX MORESBY, G.C.B. (1786—1877), AND HIS SON, JOHN MORESBY. A Record of Life and Service in the British Navy for a Hundred years. By Admiral JOHN MORESBY. With Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 14s. net. [Ready next week.

GENTLEMEN ERRANT.

The Travels and Adventures of Four Noblemen in Europe in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries. By Mrs. HENRY CUST. With Maps and Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

"Too high praise could hardly be given to the manner in which Mrs. Cust has executed her task . . . to the richness of the material, both in text and notes, and the vigour and brilliancy of the style."—The Scotsman.

"These are four goodly gentlemen. All the credulity, brutality, rough humour, pomp, and slaughter of their time are presented in these pages. Mrs. Cust has, to use an extravagant metaphor, succeeded in driving the worm of meticulous scholarship and the high-stepping stud of romance in double harness. Vivid as they are, her tales are true metal and have an infinite charm."—The Observer.

"Here come I, Little Devil Doubt—
If you don't give me money I'll sweep you all out!
Money I want and money I crave—
If you don't give me money I'll sweep you to the grave!'

LITTLE DEVIL DOUBT.

A Novel by OLIVER ONIONS. Author of "The Compleat Bachelor," "Tales from a Far Riding." 6s.

Sixth Impression in the Press.

W. J. LOCKE'S NEW NOVEL.

SEPTIMUS.

By the Author of "The Beloved Vagabond." 6s.

Truth says: "If you want a perfectly delightful book, get W. J. Locke's 'Septimus.'"

NEW NOVEL BY MISS R. MACAULAY.

THE SECRET RIVER.

By the Author of "The Furnace," "Abbots Verney." 2s. 6d. net.

HORACE A. VACHELL'S NEW NOVEL.

THE IMPENDING SWORD.

By the Author of "Brothers," "The Hill," "Her Son," etc. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready April 21st.

THE CITY OF JERUSALEM.

By COLONEL C. R. CONDER, LL.D., Author of "The Rise of Man." With Maps, Diagrams and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. net. [Ready next week.

In this volume Colonel Conder treats the history of Jerusalem for some 4,000 years, down to the present day. The work is founded on contemporary accounts, monuments, and results of excavations, including the most recent discoveries. It is popular in character, and will be fully illustrated. It is hoped that it will be specially useful for visitors to the Holy City.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

Psyche's Task.

A Discourse Concerning the Influence of Superstition on the growth of Institutions. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Jimbo. A Fantasy.

By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "John Silence," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

The Poor Law Report of 1909.

A Summary Explaining the Defects of the Present System and the Principal Recommendations of the Commission, so far as relates to England and Wales. By HELEN BOSANQUET, a Member of the Commission. Crown 8vo 3s. 6d. net.

NEW EDITION JUST PUBLISHED.

Investigations in Currency and Finance.

By W. STANLEY JEVONS, LL.D.

Edited, with an Introduction, by PROFESSOR H. S. FOXWELL, M.A. New Edition, Abridged, with Preface by H. STANLEY JEVONS, M.A., B.Sc. 8vo, 10s. net.

Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero.

By W. WARDE FOWLER, M.A., Author of "The Roman Festivals of the Period of the Republic," &c. With Map and Plans, 8vo, 10s. net.

Monuments of Christian Rome from Constantine to the Renaissance. By ARTHUR L. FROTHINGHAM, Ph.D., Professor of Archaeology and Ancient History at Princeton University. Illustrated, Extra Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. [Handbooks of Archaeology and Antiquities.

EASTER HOLIDAYS.

MACMILLAN'S GUIDE-BOOKS.

Greece, The Archipelago, Constantinople, The Coasts of Asia Minor, Crete, and Cyprus.

Being a New and Thoroughly Revised Edition of the Guide to the Eastern Mediterranean. With 13 Maps and 23 Plans, and a New Chapter on Greek Art by Professor ERNEST GARDNER. 9s. net.

Italy and Sicily.

Fifth Edition, with 55 Maps and Plans, 10s. net.

Ancient Athens.

By ERNEST ARTHUR GARDNER. With Illustrations, Maps, and Plans, 8vo, 21s. net.

Life in Ancient Athens:

The Social and Public Life of a Classical Athenian from Day to Day. By Professor T. G. TUCKER, Litt.D. (Camb.) Illustrated, Extra Crown 8vo, 5s.

The Acropolis of Athens.

By MARTIN L. D'OOGE, Professor of Greek in the University of Michigan. Illustrated, 8vo, 17s. net.

Rambles and Studies in Greece.

By the Rev. J. P. MAHAFFY, C.V.O., D.D. Fifth thoroughly Revised and Cheaper Edition, Globe 8vo, 5s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES I., II. & III. OF THE NATION

May be had free on application to the Manager.

your honor of the matther of the new roof, and sorra a bit did ye deny the condition of that same, if condition it could be called, when it dthripped, dthripped on yer own pew and on Lady Ethna's new bonnet, as herself tould ye. Thin ye said ye'd think of ut, and I gave yer honor two months, and betther, to think—and 'deed I could have thought myself in a tinth part of the time—during which I scarcely mintioned the matther in your honor's hearing, excipt from the altar a time or two. Thin I come out here agin, at long last, to remint yer honor of yer honor's promise. And (after houlding a while to the fince betwixt Ay and Nay) sure an' didn't ye lapse right into ginerosity and jooty, and sot down there, at the desk beyant, and wrote this same sorrowful dhraft for tin pounds—on the bank at Galway, in letthers and figgers, all as one as if it was yer honor's own laigal lash will and testament. . . Deed thin, M'Morogh, I mind as ye tould me the dthraft and the cash was all one, and, that being so, I tuk the liberty to say out at onst that the cash would fit in me purse far aisier than the paper. But ye had yer own way of it, and I had to be thanking ye for what I could get, as I couldn't be getting just what I wanted. So off I wint, and not twinty minyutes afther I was back at Travore comes Andy McGinty, hot-fut on the jinnet, wid a note from your honor, all sailing-wax and coronet, bidding me for anny sake not prisint the dthraft till hearing further from your honor."

The M'Morogh explains that after His Reverence had left he found that "there was much less than nothing" to his account at the bank, and so he begged him to hold the draft, to which the priest rejoins, "Airn't me hand stiff wid houlding it these two months and betther?" Equally clever are the retrospective chapters which describe The M'Morogh's stay in Rome when, as a young man, he went in search of his illustrious maternal relatives, the Crivelli, who are descended from the Orsini. M'Morogh was handsomely received by the Cardinal-Duke of York, the last of the Stuarts, who decided to grant him "the earldom conferred by the King, my father, on your maternal great-grandfather, with the additional title of Marquess of Tara." In addition to these empty honors and a silver-gilt medal, "with the royal effigy on one side and the royal arms on the other," the Cardinal-Duke uses his kind offices with the Pope to arrange a love match between The M'Morogh and Donna Pancrazia, who is a daughter of Prince Filargo. The author shows himself quite at home in these and other intimate descriptions of priestly manners, from Father Hogan's to those of the highest Catholic dignitaries, and up to the end of Chapter VII., which contains a most touching account of the death of Madame M'Morogh, a page, indeed, which shows genius, we have high hopes for "Dromina." In the next chapter, however, with the entrance of the Romany King Ludovic and his gipsy relatives on the scene, the narrative takes an unexpected turn, and the majority of readers, we fear, may agree with us that the author's plot is unworthy of his indisputable literary talent.

Romance, for which our public craves incessantly, may bear the finest blossoms in fiction, if only its roots have struck in the soil of reality. The author's psychological situations are always interesting, but the circumstances of his characters' careers lay too continuous a strain on our credence. It is plausible that Ludovic, the Romany King, should, in the novel, turn out to be none other than Louis XVII., the dauphin, who is stated in history to have died during the Terror, for we know that many credulous French Royalists believed in, and gave their adherence to, various false dauphins up to 1830. But Ludovic's gypsy up-bringing leads the author further and further into the bog of romanticism. Henry, the eldest son of The M'Morogh, forms a friendship with Ludovic, and travels to Spain as his accredited envoy for the hand of Carmen, the daughter of the Spanish Gypsy King. The issue of the situation is that Henry marries Carmen, while Ludovic falls in love with, and marries, Ethna M'Morogh, Henry's sister. Carmen's brother, Lopé, comes into the story at this point, while Fergus M'Morogh, a cousin, the villain of the piece, goes out of it for the nonce. The reader who loves an intricate plot will be gratified to learn that in Book III. most of the characters reassemble, after an interval of sixteen years, on the tropical island of Hispaniola, where the lad Mudo, the brilliant son of Henry and Carmen, plans a revolution, and reigns as Emperor, for a few weeks, over the fickle and treacherous half-breed populace.

Mr. Ascough may, of course, retort, in answer to our strictures, that he has deliberately aimed at writing a romance, and that, though there is no historical basis for most of the situations in history, they are, as social pictures, interesting and credible. The critic must reply, however, that Mr. Ayscough is clever enough to make bricks without straw, but that they tumble to pieces after the baking. All the passages that purport to paint gypsy life and character are thin and weak. The conversations of Henry and Ludovic are, moreover, highly artificial. Henry's savoir faire and diplomatic adroitness in Spain are unnatural in a lad of nineteen. And what are we to say of the fantastic improbabilities inherent in the situation in which Mudo, a lad of sixteen, makes himself the Emperor of another Haiti? Does not the author recognise that he is grafting the bastard style, say, of "Rupert of Hentzau" on to the style, say, of "Prince Otto"? The first three chapters of Book III. that trace Ludovic's fruitless intrigues as pretender to the French throne, and include an admirable interview with Pius VIII. are worth all the twenty-five chapters that follow, put together. For these three chapters are close to nature, written by a man who has intimate knowledge of the Papal atmosphere, whereas the remainder, though clever, are artistic guess work.

Mr. Ayscough, in short, is, in our view, at the turning of the ways. "Marotz" and this novel show that he has a wide experience of men and manners, that he can paint an atmosphere, and has much insight into human motives, but he is inclined to philosophise too much, to digress too much, to season his varied dish of social manners with melodramatic sauce. It is the fault of nine out of ten English novelists, to leave the firm ground of reality and take flights into romantic regions, where even success is, at best, a little cheap. In "Dromina" the shoddy of facile invention is mixed with the silk of observation. The author delivers himself seriously of the spiritual message of faith and duty, which we disentangle from the narrative of Lopé's loyalty and Mudo's high endeavor, but his art falters and fails just at the moment where sincerity and depth are essential.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. J. Arthur Thomson, Professor of Natural History in the University of Aberdeen, and one of our most distinguished biologists, has just published, through Messrs. T. & T. Clark (Edinburgh), an interesting and instructive volume, which he calls "The Bible of Nature." It consists of a series of lectures which he delivered in the United States in the year 1907 before the Lake Forest College. In the preliminary address he discourses in a fascinating way on the Wonder of the World. In Professor Thomson's view, the sense of wonder is at the roots of science and philosophy, and will always be one of the footstools of religion, and the book or Bible of nature teaches us to distrust all forms of thought, whether scientific, philosophic, or religious, which do not have the effect of heightening and deepening our sense of the mystery and wonderfulness of the things amidst which we live. Professor Thomson follows up his preliminary lecture by a history of the earth and its place in the planetary system, by an account of the advent of life upon it—the evolution of animals and the ascent of man. In each of these lectures he shows, as Goethe once said, that Nature is a book with a great lesson on every page. With the modesty of the true man of science, he concludes his volume by pointing out the inevitable limitations of all scientific inquiry. Physical science, he says, may succeed in reducing a whole order of facts to a common denominator, but it cannot explain their nature and origin. Biology, with all its knowledge of the development of life, cannot tell us what life really is. Even if science as a whole were to succeed in analysing all phenomena into a network of mechanism, it cannot tell us whence this mechanism has come, why it is here, whither it is going, and what may or may not exist beyond and beside it. None of these things are explained by science, and they never can be. They are things of the spirit, and must be spiritually discerned.

* * *

As an introduction to the study of Indian social history, the Le Bas Prize Essay of 1908, written by Mr. E. F. Oaten, B.A., LL.B., is of considerable interest and value. The scope of the volume is fully indicated by the title:

Copies of "The Nation" for the following dates wanted—

APRIL 4, 11, 18, 25,	1908.
MAY 2, 9, 16, 23, 30,	,,
JUNE 6, 13, 20, 27,	,,
JULY 4, 11, 18, 25,	,,
AUGUST 1, 8, 15, 22, 29,	,,
SEPTEMBBER 26,	,,

The Manager will be pleased to hear from readers who have copies for sale.

TOURS.

The R.M.S. DUNOTTAR CASTLE (of the Union-Castle Line) is chartered for a series of cruises as follows :—

£21 0s. 0d. ATHENS, TUNIS, CARTHAGE, MALTA, THE GREEK ISLES, April 8th.

£14 14s. 0d. PALERMO, TUNIS, ALGIERS, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, LISBON, April 28th.

Full particulars from Dr. H. S. LUNN, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

Buy

Because

It

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices : Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

NOW READY A Book for all Interested in Politics and the Life and Work of Public Men.

THE RIGHT HON. H. H. ASQUITH, M.P.

A BIOGRAPHY AND APPRECIATION.

By FRANK ELIAS.

With Photogravure Portrait Frontispiece of Mr. Asquith.

Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, Illustrated, 3/6 net.

'A careful, useful sketch and study of the Prime Minister's life and work is what we have in these pages. The monograph is one of Mr. Asquith as a public man, and the "privacies of his life have been respected." But this does not mean that the volume is without any of that personal touch which is the salt of biography. Indeed, much fresh information has been gleaned and garnered in order to give the life story which is told its rightful colour and setting.'—Daily Chronicle.

'The book brings into view at once interesting and instructive information. It records in a well-balanced narrative the many successes made by Mr. Asquith at Oxford, at the Bar, and in Parliament. It has a good portrait and must prove welcome to the many readers who are curious to know all about the Prime Minister.—The Scotsman.

London: JAMES CLARKE & CO., 13 & 14, Fleet Street, E.C., and all Booksellers.

Just Published, 6s.

The Firing Line

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS.

"In its character drawing, its gentle philosophy, its charming pictures, its happy radiance, 'The Firing Line' is one of those books which bring to us the best form of sentiment, the healthiest tone of romance."—Globe.

London:
D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.,

CATALOGUES POST FREE.

Have the Largest Selection of Bibles, Prayer Books, and Church Services. Publishers of "The Marked Bible." Lectern Lesson Book," "Priest's Pocket Bible," "Daily Service Book," &c.

CASH DISCOUNT, 3d. IN 1s.

☞ Thousands of Bibles, etc., at HALF-PRICE.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

"European Travellers in India During the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries; the Evidence Afforded by them with respect to Indian Social Institutions, and the Nature and Influence of Indian Governments" (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 3s. 6d. net); to which one may add that the travellers mentioned are confined to those who wrote memoirs of their journeys, whether those writings have perished or survive. In the preface Mr. Oaten acknowledges his indebtedness to the publications of the Hakluyt Society, which have given him access to a quantity of material otherwise unattainable except by a scholar who was master of nine or ten languages; some notion of the extent and character of these publications may be gained from the bibliography, chronologically arranged, that forms one of the appendices to this volume. Since the story of travel does not begin till the fifteenth century, Marco Polo is excluded, but most of the other world-famous voyagers come into the narrative. Thus we have Conti, the Venetian, in the middle of the fifteenth century, and the great Portuguese, Vasco da Gama, towards its close; William Hawkins and Sir Thomas Roe, the accredited ambassadors of James I. to the Great Mogul; the eccentric Coryat and Manucci; and Tavernier, the Frenchman. Thomas Stephens was actually the first Englishman to set foot in India—in 1579; but it was not till the fame of Akbar, the greatest of the Great Moguls, had become European that we made any serious attempt to open up trade relations with the Indian Empire. On the other hand, Vasco da Gama's expedition sailed in 1497, and the ascendancy of the Portuguese power during the next century was the chief obstacle and menace with which the pioneers of other nations had to deal. These travellers' tales, originally chronicled for useful information's sake, contain plenty of romance and not a little entertainment for the reader of to-day.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning. March 19.	Price Friday morning, March 26.
Consols 2½ per cent.	83 11/16 ...	83 11/16
French 3 per cent.	97 ...	97
German 3 per cent.	85½ ...	85
Russian Fours	97¼ ...	97⅝

There has been no encouraging features during the week. The markets have been overshadowed by fears of war in the Balkans, and were very dull until Wednesday, when a general shrinkage occurred in Foreign bonds. It has been noticed during the last few weeks that Russian Government loans serve in our market as the barometer of the situation. There is far more speculation in these bonds than in those of any other European Government, and there are plenty of them about. There is no essential reason why Russia should be troubled by what happens between Servia and Austria. But Russian finances are in such a wretched condition that the market is very sensitive, feeling that a very little additional pressure might provoke a crisis. On Wednesday German and Prussian Threes both fell a point. It seems as though another German imperial loan will be necessary before very long, as the German Government's new tax proposals make no way. But the recovery on Thursday was marked, as will be seen from our preliminary table of prices The Honduras Government, by the way, which has been a defaulter since the early seventies, has just declared itself willing to pay a small sum in interest to the bondholders. Their only asset is a railway, which is said to be in a very bad state of repair.

The Argentine Railway Position.

The interim dividend of the Buenos Ayres Great Southern is the first important Argentine Railway dividend declared this year. The dividends, as a whole, will be watched with considerable interest, and investors will be very anxious to see whether the old rates can be maintained on the new scale of capital. So far as this first dividend is any guide, it would appear that the companies are just about maintaining their net income at its former level, the increase in gross receipts more or less counterbalancing the increase in fixed charges. The preliminary announcement states that, after providing for interest, &c., there is a balance to net revenue account of £553,043, which compares with £556,596 at this time last year. The traffic receipts up to the end of December, the point to which the interim report brings us, had increased by £118,000, and the whole of this sum was apparently absorbed in additional working expenses and fixed charges. Since that date the company has issued another £2,500,000 in extension shares, which will still further increase the interest during the current half-year. And, of course, the Great Southern has not been the biggest borrower in the market; that honor belongs to the Buenos Ayres and Pacific, which in the last few years has at once been raising capital and increasing its revenue at an enormous rate. The traffic receipts of four principal railways from July 1st (the beginning of the business year) to the present date are as follows:—

	1907-8. £.	1908-9. £.	Inc. £.
Buenos Ayres and Pacific	2,427,000 ...	2,899,000 ...	472,000
Buenos Ayres Great Southern	3,227,000 ...	3,362,000 ...	135,000
Buenos Ayres Western	1,496,000 ...	1,609,000 ...	113,000
Central Argentine	3,473,000 ...	3,525,000 ...	52,000
	10,623,000	11,395,000	772,000

The increase in the Buenos Ayres and Pacific's earnings is equivalent to nearly 20 per cent., but the company is operating 153 miles more than last year, and has, of course, a much larger capital. What the final dividends are likely to be is debated ground on which I certainly shall not venture here, but I may show, roughly, the course that prices of the ordinary stocks have taken while these new issues have been flooding the market:—

	1906. H.	L.	1907. H.	L.	1908. H.	L.	Now.
Buenos Ayres and Pacific	136¼	120 ...	125¾	105¾ ...	124¼	109 ...	111¾
Buenos Ayres Great Southern	144¾	122½ ...	129½	110½ ...	132	119½ ...	123
Central Argentine Def.	119	105 ...	110½	89 ...	109½	95½ ...	98½

It is a curious record, and the position now is extremely interesting. Those who believe in the future of the Argentine ought to be attracted by some of the stocks at their present prices, but they must never forget that, even with continued prosperity, a temporary reduction of dividend until the new capital earns its own dividends is quite possible.

The Big London Shops.

It is a favorite theory, especially in the United States, that the big undertakings are the ones that pay. It would be more true to say that when a small undertaking flourishes exceedingly the proprietor is apt to increase its size, and convert it into a limited liability company. Probably the owner of a successful business is well advised to cash his goodwill. But the public which subscribes to the shares is very apt to get landed in the end. As a business extends, the possibility of loss and leakage is enlarged. That is why London banks and London shops are with difficulty induced to establish branches in foreign cities. The huge new shop of Selfridge's is a branch from Chicago, and the general opinion here is that the proprietors have flung away their money on advertising with almost as much recklessness as did the founders of a new Liberal paper (since deceased) some three or four years ago. The true advertisement, after all, is the cheapness and high quality of what you sell. No doubt the success of some of the big London stores and shops is very tempting to the enterprising capitalist. But there are failures as well as triumphs. In fact, one hears that a very big concern is just about to pull down the shutters. It is quite a mistake to suppose that the big ones are all powerful. When Harrod's secured Mr. Haldane to advertise the shop in connection with compulsory volunteering, there was such a clamor of wrath from smaller rivals that Mr. Haldane simply ran away, routed by the "Drapers' Record" and other trade organs.

Lucellum.

THE LEGAL
Insurance Company, LTD.

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell,
The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane,
The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Chairman - J. FIELD BEALE, Solicitor.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion.

Write for particulars. HENRY M. LOW, General Manager.

If you suffer from Liver Complaints

Merit's Liverets will promptly cure you

Prepared, as prescribed by a prominent Physician from purely vegetable ingredients.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

combine both curative and tonic properties, and are especially compounded to avoid that debilitating effect which the majority of Liver medicines produce. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists or direct from MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name, Merit's Liverets, and the signature, Merit & Co. is on the package.
Spurious imitations are useless.

will promptly cure you

MISCELLANEOUS.

OLD-FASHIONED COTTAGE surrounded by good garden. Six rooms, good kitchen and range, and large outbuilding. Dry and convenient. Not overlooked. Tradesmen's entrance. Old-world, unspoilt part of Essex. Station about hour from City. Good service of tradesmen and postal facilities. £25 to good tenant.—P., c/o "Nation" Office.

COATS OF ARMS and PEDIGREES.—The Author of "A List of Emigrant Ministers to America" will send free to any interested a circular on the legal right to arms.—GERALD FOTHERGILL, 11, Brussels-road, New Wandsworth.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

TANGYES
TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it WILL BE REPLACED.

Rowntree's

Makers to H.M. the King

Try it!—
"One taste is worth a chapter of talk."

"Warms and Cheers"
ELECT Cocoa

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.
Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

SUMMER TERM COMMENCES APRIL 28th, 1909.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,

STAFFORDSHIRE.

Careful and Individual Attention.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

In the South of Cheshir four miles from Crewe. Opened 1900. Modern Buildings with 24 acres of grounds. A Preparatory School in immediate connection with the Present School will be opened in May. Next Entrance Examination for both Schools, April 2nd, at the School. Application should be made to the HEADMASTER, or to the CLERK TO THE GOVERNORS, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauset Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.

Six Scholarships (£60 and under) will be offered on June 16th. Examination at Giggleswick, in London, or at Preparatory Schools. Particulars from Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle, Yorkshire.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,

Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." / Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 „ ... ... 6d. „

A Memorable Debate

An Interesting Reminiscence of

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE

and Mr. Lloyd George, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer.

In a debate in the House of Commons, on the 13th June, 1890, on the Local Taxation Bill, Mr. Gladstone said, "Enough of idle words; if you were to multiply these amendments till they were as thick as the leaves in Vallombrosa, or as plentiful as the advertisements of you would not prevent the consequences of this clause." And in the same debate, as the Pall Mall Gazette reported, "Mr. Lloyd George, the new Member for Carnarvon, made a capital maiden speech, full of promise for his future career."

Pears' Soap

This was eighteen years ago, but tributes to the popularity of Pears' continue to appear in an ever-broadening stream. It is 120 years since Pears' was invented, and it still remains the leading toilet soap of the world—first in purity, first in beautifying properties, first in point of economy and first in public favour.

The highest possible honours at the leading International Exhibition since 1851 (including the only Grand Prix ever given for a Toilet Soap) have been awarded to Pears.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1909.

THE NATION, March 6, 1909.

BOOKS OF THE SPRING SEASON.

The Nation

SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1909.

MACMILLAN'S NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

THE STATESMAN'S YEAR BOOK. Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World, for the Year 1909. Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, LL.D. Revised after Official Returns. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Shortly.

TOTEMISM AND EXOGAMY. A Treatise on Certain Ancient Forms of Superstition and Society. By Professor J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D. Three Vols. With Maps. 8vo. [Shortly.

PSYCHE'S TASK. A Discourse concerning the influence of Superstition on the Growth of Institutions. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

The book is "an attempt to sort out the seeds of good from the heap of evil which we call superstition, just as Pysche was given the task of sorting out the different kinds of seeds." The subjects dealt with are Government, Private Property, Marriage, and Respect for Human Life.

OXFORD LECTURES ON POETRY. By A. C. BRADLEY, LL.D. 8vo. [Shortly.

Complete in 1 Vol.

THE GOLDEN TREASURY OF THE BEST SONGS AND LYRICAL POEMS IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. Selected and arranged by F. T. PALGRAVE. Complete. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Shortly.

THE POEMS AND SONNETS OF LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON. Comprising "Swallow Flights," "In the Garden of Dreams," "At the Wind's Will, &c. With Introduction by HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Shortly.

THE POOR LAW REPORT OF 1909. A Summary Explaining the Defects of the Present System and the Principal Recommendatians of the Commission, so far as relates to England and Wales. By HELEN BOSANQUET. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THE FAITH AND WORKS OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. By the Author of "Confessio Medici." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Shortly.

SEVENTH EDITION JUST PUBLISHED.

POPULAR HANDBOOK TO THE NATIONAL GALLERY, including by special permission, Notes Collected from the Works of JOHN RUSKIN. Vol. I. Foreign Schools. By EDWARD T. COOK. Crown 8vo, leather, 10s. net.

In this new edition of Mr. Cook's well known handbook not only have all recent acquisitions been included, but the text has been carefully revised throughout.

THE MARKS OF POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. By WILLIAM BURTON, F.C.S., and R. L. HOBSON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. [Shortly.

THE STRUGGLE FOR IMPERIAL UNITY. By COLONEL GEORGE T. DENISON. Extra Crown, 8vo. [Shortly.

A CATALOGUE RAISONNÉ OF THE WORKS OF THE MOST EMINENT DUTCH PAINTERS OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. Based on the work of John Smith, by C. HOFSTEDE DE GROOT (with the assistance of Dr. W. R. VALENTINER). Translated and Edited by EDWARD G. HAWKE. In 10 vols. 8vo, 25s. net each.

Vol. II. The Works of Aelbert Cuyp and Philips Wouwerman. [Shortly.

PEACE AND HAPPINESS. By LORD AVEBURY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SOCIAL LIFE AT ROME IN THE AGE OF CICERO. By W. WARDE FOWLER, M.A. With Map and Plans. 8vo, 10s. net.

THE MONUMENTS OF CHRISTIAN ROME from Constantine to the Rénaissance. By ARTHUR L. FROTHINGHAM, Ph.D., Professor of Ancient History and Archæology at Princeton University. Illustrated. Extra Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. [Tuesday.

(Handbooks of Archæology and Antiquities.)

THE ANCIENT GREEK HISTORIANS. (Harvard Lectures.) By Professor J. B. BURY, Litt.D., LL.D. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE CHARACTERS OF THEOPHRASTUS. An English Translation from a Revised Text, with Introduction and Notes by Sir RICHARD JEBB. A New Edition, Edited by J. E. SANDYS, Litt.D. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Classical Library.

THE ACROPOLIS OF ATHENS. By MARTIN L. D'OOGE, Professor of Greek in the University of Michigan. Illustrated, 8vo, 17s. net.

MARS AS THE ABODE OF LIFE. By PERCIVAL LOWELL, A.B., LL.D., Author of "Mars and its Canals," &c. Illustrated, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

JIMBO. A Fantasy. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "John Silence," etc. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Daily Chronicle—"'Jimbo' is a delicious book, and one that should be read by all who long at times to escape from this working-day world into the region of haunting and half remembered things."

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE WHITE SISTER. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. [May 4th.

GERVASE. By MRS PERCY DEARMER. [Shortly.

TONO-BUNGAY. By H. G. WELLS. Second Impression. Now Ready.

ONE IMMORTALITY. By H. FIELDING HALL, Author of "The Soul of a People." &c.

AUSTRALIAN SOCIALISM. An Historical Sketch of its Origin and Developments. By A. ST. LEDGER. Crown 8vo. [Shortly.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Messrs. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

MESSRS. METHUEN have just published two long and important Novels—KATHERINE THE ARROGANT, by Mrs. B. M. CROKER, and MY LADY OF SHADOWS, by JOHN OXENHAM.

MESSRS. METHUEN will shortly publish a NEW ROMANCE by BERNARD CAPES, entitled

THE LOVE-STORY OF ST. BEL.

They call attention to the great success of their Spring Novels. THE GIFTED FAMILY, THE FLOWER OF THE HEART, BROTHERS ALL, and VIRGINIA PERFECT are all in Second or Third Editions.

Messrs. Methuen's New Illustrated Announcement List, containing notes of many new and interesting Books, is now ready and will be sent post free to any applicant.

GENERAL LITERATURE

THE TRIALS OF FIVE QUEENS. By R. STORRY DEANS. With 12 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Shortly.
A book dealing with the Trials of Mary Queen of Scots, Anne Boleyn, Katherine of Aragon, Marie Antoinette, and Queen Caroline.

TRAGEDY QUEENS OF THE GEORGIAN ERA. By JOHN FYVIE. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
This book is a series of biographical sketches of all the most prominent English tragedy actresses of the eighteenth century, from the famous Madam Barry and the fascinating Oldfield down to the majestic Siddons.
"Mr. Fyvie's work is sound throughout, and is not marred by the vulgarity of extravagant enthusiasm."—Morning Post.
"Full of amusing incidents."—Daily News.
"The writer always has an interesting, well-studied story to tell."—Scotsman.

THE THOUGHTS OF LUCIA HALLIDAY. Edited by R. M. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
This book is meant to be taken up in leisure hours, and to be companionable when you lounge under a tree in summer, or enjoy a lonely hour by a winter fire.

HOME LIFE IN ITALY. By LINA DUFF GORDON (Mrs. Aubrey Waterfield). With many Illustrations, of which 13 are by Aubrey Waterfield, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Second Edition.
"One of the most delightful books about Italian life that we have ever read."—Athenæum.

MAN AND THE UNIVERSE. By Sir OLIVER LODGE. F.R.S. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Sixth Edition.

LORENZO THE MAGNIFICENT; and Florence in her Golden Age. By E. L. S. HORSBURGH. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 15s. net.
"A work of literary value and philosophic value which will bring profit and delight at every reading."—Outlook.

HER INFINITE VARIETY: a Feminine Portrait Gallery. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, gilt top, 5s. [Third Edition.
This is uniform with "The Open Road," "The Friendly Town," &c.
"Surely a like array of beautiful and entertaining women was never marshalled.—Spectator.

THE CREED IN THE EPISTLES. By WILFRID RICHMOND, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

TWO ENGLISH QUEENS AND PHILIP. By MARTIN HUME, M.A., Pembroke College, Cambridge. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 12 other illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.
"A fine and masterly volume. The book is better reading than any historical novel, and it has the crowning virtue of being true."—Daily Telegraph.

READINGS ON THE PARADISO OF DANTE. Chiefly based on the Commentary of BENVENUTO DA IMOLA. By the Hon. WILLIAM WARREN VERNON, M.A. With an Introduction by the BISHOP OF RIPON. A New and Improved Edition, in 2 vols., crown 8vo, 15s. net.
"A monument of industry and a work which no student of Dante would care to be without."—Westminster Gazette.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH. By J. H. MAUDE, M.A., Rector of Hilgay. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Handbooks of English Church History.
The first of a new series. It deals with the foundation of the English Church, and its history to the year 800.

THE ANGLO-SAXON CHURCH AND THE NORMAN CONQUEST. By C. T. CRUTTWELL, M.A., Rector of Ewelme and Canon of Peterborough. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Handbooks of English Church History.

THE END OF THE MIDDLE AGE, 1273-1453. By E. C. LODGE, Vice-Principal and History Tutor, Lady Margaret Hall. With many Maps, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Six Ages of European History.
This book marks the decay of the political system of the Middle Ages, and the disappearance of the old unity in Western Europe.

THE AGE OF THE ENLIGHTENED DESPOT, 1660. 1789. By A. H. JOHNSON, M.A., Fellow of All Souls'. With many Maps, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Six Ages of European History.

THE REMAKING OF MODERN EUROPE, 1789-1878. By J. A. R. MARRIOTT, M.A. With many Maps, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Six Ages of European History.
This is intended to serve as a text-book for the highest forms in schools, particularly for those preparing for Local and other similar examinations.

ENGLAND'S RUIN: Discussed in Fourteen Letters to a Protectionist. By A. M. S. METHUEN. Crown 8vo, 3d. net. [Eighth Edition.
This is the eighth edition, and the book has been carefully revised and all the figures brought up to the end of 1906.

FICTION

HOLY ORDERS. By MARIE CORELLI. 110th Thousand. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SALTHAVEN. By W. W. JACOBS. Illustrated by WILL Owen. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"We consider Mr. Jacobs a national benefactor."—Times.
"No admirer of 'A Master of Craft' will be disappointed with 'Salthaven.'"—Morning Post.
"He would be a churl who could read the work without laughing aloud."—Observer.
"You will certainly chuckle over it all the time."—Daily Graphic.
"Mr. Jacobs shows once more a complete mastery of those special forms of humour."—Birmingham Post.
"A well-told story with surprises on every odd page."—Scotsman.

KATHERINE THE ARROGANT. By B. M. CROKER, Author of "Peggy of the Bartons." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.
This is, like all Mrs. Croker's works, vivacious and arresting; the story of a young orphan girl of good birth and education whom circumstances force to earn her own living—always an attractive theme to the modern novelist of manners. Chance gives her as employer an unscrupulous old woman, and the story follows her adventures not only in London but in Switzerland with much entertaining thoroughness.

MY LADY OF SHADOWS. By JOHN OXENHAM, Author of "The Gate of the Desert." Crown 8vo, 6s.
In this novel Mr. Oxenham's many readers have the pleasure of meeting again a number of old friends, and many new ones, all most excellent company. The novel deals with a somewhat difficult and delicate situation—the complete lapsus of memory on the part of a bride immediately after the wedding.

BROTHERS ALL: More Stories of Dutch Peasant Life. By MAARTEN MAARTENS, Author of "An Old Maid's Love." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.
"It is both carefully and sympathetically written, and bears throughout the impress of reality."—Outlook.
"Each story is a finished piece of work."—Daily Telegraph.
"Mr. Maartens' creative faculty is vigorous, clever, effective, and fertile."—Daily News.

THE GIFTED FAMILY. By BARRY PAIN, Author of "Lindley Kays." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.
"A delightful novel, interesting from the first page to the last . . . kindly and humorous. I repeat that this is a delightful book."—Punch.
"It is all very true, all very amusing."—Standard.
"It is in Mr. Pain's best vein, and is full of shrewd observation."—Liverpool Post.
"It is all immensely, superlatively happy, very charming, and very human."—Court Journal.

THE STORY OF VIRGINIA PERFECT. By PEGGY WEBLING, Author of "Blue Jay." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.
"Here is a book that the New Year will find hard to beat, welcome as the aconite and snowdrop, full of tears and laughter and true human things."—Morning Post.
"A book at once fragrant and unconventional."—Punch.
"A delicate and beautiful piece of work."—Morning Leader.
"It is rarely that one reads a novel having such delicate characterisation and conveying such a dainty sense of charm."—Manchester Courier.

THE FLOWER OF THE HEART. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.
"The incidents are not only exciting, but of real power and passion."—Morning Post.
"The story is an admirably conceived and admirably written piece of dramatic fiction."—Outlook.
"The book is of absorbing interest and a masterly piece of work."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"Alice Eversley is one of the sweetest, most delicately charming women of modern fiction."—Daily Mail.
"A fine and powerful novel. No one can question its sincerity and power."—Daily Telegraph.

A SON OF THE EMPEROR. By NEWTON V. STEWART. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Mr. Stewart works out with great skill the pattern of the story, and has written a book of unusual interest."—Daily Mail.
"Mr. Stewart has written his story with spirit, and he has an eye for colour and the picturesque."—Daily Chronicle.

IN THE POTTER'S HOUSE. By G. D. ELDRIDGE. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"The author is comparable to Mr. Caine because of his splendid inventiveness of incidents and his ceaseless fluency."—Daily News.
"The attitudes of the characters are powerfully handled, and the whole book has strength and freshness."—Morning Leader.
"It is a strong work, and the characters are etched in incisively and vehemently."—Standard.

TO BE PUBLISHED LATER

BARBARY SHEEP. By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Garden of Allah." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SET IN SILVER. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON, Authors of "The Lightning Conductor." With a Frontispiece in Colour by ARTHUR H. BUCKLAND, and other illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.
In this new novel, which describes a motor tour through England, Mr. and Mrs. Williamson again are faithful to the motor car, into which they pack their characters, and from which are caught those glimpses of England which they give so alluringly.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

Supplement, March 6, 1909.

The Nation

The Pick of the Publishing Season.

The following is a selection of the more interesting Books appearing in the Publisher's Spring Lists, grouped under different subject headings.

ART AND ARCHÆOLOGY.

The Lewis Bequest at the National Gallery. By Maurice Brockwell. (Allen. 2s. 6d. net.)

Memorials of Old Lancashire. Edited by Lieut.-Colonel Fishwick and the Rev. P. H. Ditchfield. 2 vols. (Bemrose. 25s.)

Memorials of Old Middlesex Edited by J. Tavenor-Perry. (Bemrose. 15s. net.)

Greek Architecture. By Edith A. Browne. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)

Cassell's Royal Academy Pictures and Sculpture, 1909. (Cassell. 3s. net; cloth, 5s. net. Also in 5 parts, 7d. net each.)

Memorials of St. Paul's Cathedral. By Archdeacon Sinclair. With illustrations by Louis Weirter. (Chapman & Hall. 16s. net.)

Fresco Painting: Its Art and Technique. By James Ward. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Medici Series of Colored Reproductions after the Old Masters. XIV. Andrea Mantegna: The Madonna and Child with Cherubim. (Chatto & Windus. 17s. 6d. net.) XV. Titian: Bacchus and Ariadne. (Chatto & Windus. 25s. net.)

The Art and Letters Library. Stories of the Spanish Artists until Goya. Collected by Luis Carreño. Stories of the French Artists from Clouet to Ingres. Collected by P. M. Turner. Stories of the German Artists. Collected by Professor Dr. H. W. Singer. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net each.)

Notes on the Science of Picture-Making. By C. J. Holmes. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Mind of the Artist. Collected by Laurence Binyon. (Chatto & Windus. 6s. net.)

A New Light on the Renaissance. By Harold Bayley. (Dent. 12s. 6d. net.)

A History of Art. Vol. II. The Middle Ages. By Dr. Giulio Carotti. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)

Art in the British Isles. By Sir Walter Armstrong. (Director of the National Gallery, Ireland.) (Heinemann. 6s. net.)

The National Gallery. By Paul G. Kenody, M. W. Brockwell, and F. W. Lippmann. Edited by T. Leman Hare. In 17 parts and 2 vols. (T. C. & E. C. Jack. 1s. net each part, 10s. 6d. net each vol.)

Masterpieces in Color. Holbein. By S. L. Bensusan. Burne-Jones. By A Lys Baldry. Vigée Le Brun. By C. Haldane MacFall. J. F. Millet. By Percy M. Turner. (Jack.)

The Great English Portrait Painters, 18th Century. Reynolds, Gainsborough, and Romney. (Jack.)

The Leaders of the English Pre-Raphaelites: Rossetti, Holman Hunt, and Millais. (Jack.)

The Cathedrals and Churches of Belgium. By T. Francis Bumpus. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)

The Architects' Library. A History of Architectural Development. In 3 vols. Vol. II. Mediæval. By F. M. Simpson. (Longmans, Green.)

Monuments of Christian Rome. By Arthur L. Frothingham. (Macmillan. 10s. 6d.)

A Catalogue Raisonné of the Works of the Most Eminent Dutch Painters of the Seventeenth Century. Based on the work of John Smith, by C. Hofstede de Groot. Translated by E. G. Hawke. In 10 vols. Vol. II. (Macmillan. 25s. net each.)

The Marks of Pottery and Porcelain. By William Burton and R. L. Hobson. (Macmillan.)

Rubens. By Edward Dillon. (Methuen. 25s. net.)

Michel Angelo. By Gerald S. Davies. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

Raphael. By A. P. Oppé. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

Botticelli. By Mary L. Bonnor. (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net.)

English Costume. By George Clinch, F.G.S. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

A History of Indian and Eastern Architecture. By the late James Fergusson. (Murray.)

Douris and the Painters of Greek Vases. Translated from the French of Edmond Pottier. By Bettina Kahnweiler. Preface by Jane E. Harrison. (Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

Decorative Design. By A. H. Christie. (Oxford University Press.)

The Stone and Bronze Ages in Italy. By T. E. Peet. (Oxford University Press.)

Modern Artists. By Christian Brinton. (Paul. 25s. net.)

Roodscreens and Roodlofts. By Frederick Bligh Bond, and the Rev. Dom Bede Camm. (Pitman. 32s. net.)

How to Appreciate Prints. By Frank Weitenkamp. (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Buried City of Kenfig. By Thomas Gray. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

Pre-Historic Rhodesia. By R. N. Hall. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

The Life, Letters, and Works of J. Ruskin. Vols. 36 and 37. (Allen.)

Canadian Types of the Old Régime (1608-1698). By Charles W. Colby. (Bell. 10s. 6d. net.)

Builders of United Italy (1806-1898). By Rupert Sargent Holland. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)

Miniature Series of Great Writers. Goldsmith. By E. Lang Buckland. (Bell. 1s. net.)

Life of Field-Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain, G.C.B. By G. W. Forrest. (Blackwood. 18s. net.)

The Work and Play of a Government Inspector. By Herbert Preston-Thomas. With Preface by the Rt. Hon. John Burns. (Blackwood. 10s. 6d. net.)

Sir Walter Scott's Friends. By Florence MacCunn. (Blackwood. 12s. 6d. net.)

Some Memories of My Spare Time, 1856-1885. By General the Rt. Hon. Sir Henry Brackenbury, G.C.B. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)

Reminiscences. By the Rt. Hon. Lord Kingsburgh, K.C.B. (Blackwood. 7s. 6d. net.)
Samuel Pepys: Administrator, Observer, Gossip. By E. Hallam Moorhouse. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)
Chapters of My Life: An Autobiography. By Samuel Waddington. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)
Richard Mansfield: His Life and Art. By Paul Wilstach. (Chapman & Hall. 16s. net.)
An Actor's Story. By Bransby Williams. (Chapman & Hall.)
Melba. By Agnes M. Murphy. (Chatto & Windus. 16s. net.)
The Valley of Shadows. By Francis Grierson. (Constable. 6s. net.)
Reminiscences of Richard Wagner. By Angelo Neumann. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
Glimpses of the 'Twenties. By William Toynbee. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)
Aeneas Silvius (Enea Silvio de Piccolomini—Pius II.): Orator, Man of Letters, Statesman, and Pope. By William Boulting. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Letters of L. van Beethoven. By Dr. Alfred C. Kalischer. Translated by J. S. Shedlock. 2 vols. (Dent. 21s. net.)
William Blake. By Basil de Selincourt. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)
Blake. By G. K. Chesterton. In the Popular Library of Art. (Duckworth. Cloth, 2s. net; leather 2s. 6d. net.)
Royal Lovers and Mistresses. By Dr. A. S. Rappoport. (Greening. 16s. net.)
Memoirs of the Duchesse de Dino. Vol. I. Translated by G. W. Chrystal. (Heinemann. 10s. net.)
Recollections of Baron de Frénilly, Peer of France (1768-1828). Edited by Arthur Chuquet. Translated by Frederic Lees. (Heinemann. 10s. net.)
The Life of Principal Rainy. By Patrick Carnegie Simpson. 2 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
Pepys. By Percy Lubbock. In the Series of Literary Lives. Edited by W. R. Nicoll. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.
Mr. Pope: A Chronicle of His Life and Work. By George Paston. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)
Richard Jefferies: His Life and Work. By Edward Thomas. (Hutchinson. 10s. 6d. net.)
King's Favourite. The Love Story of Robert Carr and Lady Essex. By Philip Gibbs. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)
Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette. By Lieut.-Col. A. C. P. Haggard, D.S.O. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)
Richard Savage. A Mystery in Biography. By Stanley V. Makower. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)
The Romance of a Great Career. The Story of the Life of Sir Robert Hart. Told by his Niece, Juliet Bredin. (Hutchinson. 6s. net.)
The Life of Joan of Arc. By Anatole France. A Translation by Winifred Stephens. 2 vols. (Lane. 25s. net.)
The Love Letters of Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh. Edited by Alexander Carlyle. 2 vols. (Lane. 25s. net.)
Maria Edgeworth and Her Circle in the Days of Bonaparte and Bourbon. By Constance Hill. (Lane. 21s. net.)
The Love Affairs of Napoleon. By Joseph Turquan. Translated by J. L. May. (Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)
Ladies Fair and Frail. Sketches of the Demi-monde during the Eighteenth Century. By Horace Bleackley. (Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)
A Sister of Prince Rupert, Elizabeth Princess Palatine Abbess of Herford. By Elizabeth Godfrey. (Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Journal of John Mayne During a Tour on the Continent upon its Re-opening After the Fall of Napoleon, 1814. Edited by his grandson, John Mayne Colles. (Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)
Grieg and His Music. By H. T. Finck. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
Cesar Franck: A Study. Translated from the French of Vincent d'Indy. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
George Bernard Shaw. By G. K. Chesterton. (Lane. 5s. net.)
Paul Verlaine: His Life, His Work. By E. Lepelletier. (Werner Laurie. £1 1s. net.)
Lola Montez: An Adventuress of the 'Forties. By Edmund B. d'Auvergne. (Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Love Story of Empress Josephine. By James Endell. (Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)
General Lee: Man and Soldier. By Thomas Nelson Page. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)
Sir George Mackenzie, King's Advocate, of Rosenhaugh. His Life and Times, 1636 (?)—1691. By Andrew Lang. (Longmans, Green. 15s. net.)
A Memoir of George Howard Wilkinson, Bishop of St. Andrews, Dunkeld, and Dunblane, and Primus of the Scottish Church. By Arthur James Mason. 2 vols. (Longmans, Green.)
Life of Richard Steward, Dean-Designate of St. Paul's and Westminster, 1641. By the late Rev. Nicholas Pocock. (Masters. 3s. 6d.)
A Rose of Savoy: Marie Adélaide of Savoy, Duchesse de Bourgogne, Mother of Louis XV. By H. Noel Williams. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
George Selwyn and the Wits. By S. Parnell Kerr. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
Enchanters of Men. By Ethel Colburn Mayne. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
Tragedy Queens of the Georgian Era. By John Fyvie. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Last King of Poland and His Contemporaries. By R. Nisbet Bain. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
Napoleon's Marshals. By R. P. Dunn Pattison. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
My Memoirs. By Alexandre Dumas. Translated by E. M. Waller. In 6 vols. (Methuen. 6s. each.)
The Military Memoirs of General Kuropatkin. Translated by Captain A. B. Lindsay. Edited by Major E. S. Swinton. 2 vols. (Murray.)
Bancroft Memoirs, Old and New. By Sir Squire and Lady Bancroft. (Murray.)
Correspondence of George Canning and Some Intimate Friends. Edited by Captain Josceline Bagot. 2 vols. (Murray. 30s. net.)
Gentlemen Errant. The Travels and Adventures of Four Noblemen in Europe in the XV. and XVI. Centuries. By Mrs. Henry Cust. (Murray.)
The Religious Life of William Ewart Gladstone. By D. C. Lathbury. (Murray.)
The Life of Philibert Commerson, D.M., Naturaliste du Roi. An Old-World Story of French Travel and Science in the Days of Linnæus. By the late Captain S. Pasfield Oliver. Edited by G. F. Scott Elliot. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)
The Life of Admiral Sir Leopold McClintock. By Sir Clements Markham. (Murray. 15s. net.)
Life of the Honourable Mrs. Norton. By Miss Perkins. (Murray.)
The Life of Major-General Sir Charles W. Wilson, K.C.B. By Colonel Sir Charles M. Watson. (Murray.)
Two Admirals, Sir Fairfax Moresby, G.C.B. (1786-1877), and His Son, John Moresby. By Admiral John Moresby. (Murray.)
Life of Lord Norton, Statesman and Philanthropist, 1814-1905. By William S. Childe-Pemberton. (Murray. 12s. net.)
Major-General Sir John Ardagh. By his wife, Susan Countess of Malmesbury. (Murray.)
The Life of Sir William Russell. By J. B. Atkins. (Murray.)
Johannes Brahms. The Herzogenberg Correspondence. Edited by Max Kalbeck. Translated by Hannah Bryant. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)
Letters from the Peninsula (1808-1812). By Lieut.-General Sir William Warre. (Murray.)
Prince Rupert. By Mrs. Erskine. (Nash. 15s. net.)
Leaves from My African Diary. By Mrs. Fred Maturin. (Nash. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Romance of Richelieu. By Joseph McCabe. (Nash. 15s. net.)
Fresh Leaves. By the Author of "Leaves from a Life." (Nash. 10s. 6d. net.)
The Husbands of Marie Louise. By Dr. Max Billard. (Nash. 15s. net.)
Fair Women of Fontainebleau. By Miss F. Hamel. (Nash. 15s. net.)

WILLIAMS & NORGATE'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Ready March 9. Demy 8vo, 336 pages. 6s. net.

MAN AND THE BIBLE.

A REVIEW OF THE PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN HUMAN HISTORY.

By J. ALLANSON PICTON, M.A. (Lond.), Author of "The Mystery of Matter," "The Religion of the Universe," etc., etc.

New Edition, entirely Reset, with much new matter and maps. Ready.

THE MISSION AND EXPANSION OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE FIRST THREE CENTURIES.

By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D., Berlin.
Translated and Edited by Rev. Jas. Moffatt, D.D.
In two volumes, Demy 8vo, Cloth, 25s. net.

Ready March 9. Crown 8vo, Cloth. 4s. 6d. net.

MAN'S ORIGIN, DESTINY AND DUTY.

By HUGH MAC COLL.

It is a careful examination of the Theory of Evolution in its bearing on Theism, a doctrine to which, far from being hostile, the Theory of Evolution is shown to afford a powerful support.

CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.
New Editions. Just Ready.

Second Edition now ready. 5s.

THE LIFE OF THE SPIRIT.

By RUDOLF EUCKEN, Professor of Philosophy, Jena.

Vol. I. Ready. Crown 8vo, Cloth 6s.

LUKE, THE PHYSICIAN.

Author of "The Third Gospel," and "The Acts of The Apostles," By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D.

Almost through the Press.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY:

ITS WRITINGS AND TEACHINGS IN THEIR HISTORICAL CONNECTIONS.
VOL. II. HISTORICAL BOOKS.

By OTTO PFLEIDERER, D.D.
Professor of Practical Theology in the University of Berlin.

Ready. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

ETHICS OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

By THEODOR HAERING,
Professor of New Testament Dogmatics and Ethics at Tübingen.

THE MOST IMPORTANT SIXPENNY OF THE MOMENT.

LIFE AND MATTER.

By Sir OLIVER LODGE, D.Sc., F.R.S., etc.
Second Edition. With an Appendix of Definitions and Explanations.

THE MINERAL KINGDOM.

By Dr. RHEINHARD BRAIMS.
Translated with Additions by L. J. Spencer, F.G.S., British Museum.
To be completed in 25 Parts, at 2s. each net. Parts 1—3 Now Ready.
Write for Prospectus and Specimen of Colored Plates.

WORKS BY HERBERT SPENCER.

"Extremely Interesting Volumes."—Spectator.
Reduced Edition, Just Ready.
2 vols. demy 8vo, cloth, gilt tops, with a number of Illustrations, some in Photogravure, 12s. 6d. net; 13s. 6d. post free.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY
BY HERBERT SPENCER.

A SYSTEM OF SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY.

	s.	d.
FIRST PRINCIPLES. Thoroughly Revised. Popular Re-issue Now Ready	7	6
PRINCIPLES OF BIOLOGY. 2 Vols. (Revised and Enlarged)	36	0
PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY. 2 Vols. ...	36	0
PRINCIPLES OF SOCIOLOGY. Vol. I.	21	0
Ditto ... ... Vol. II.	18	0
Ditto ... ... Vol III.... ...	16	0
PRINCIPLES OF ETHICS. Vol. I.	15	0
Ditto Vol. II.	12	6
JUSTICE (Separately)	6	0

Just Ready. Uniform with New Edition of "First Principles." Entirely Reset. Cloth, 3s. net.

THE DATA OF ETHICS.

OTHER WORKS.

	s.	d.
THE STUDY OF SOCIOLOGY	10	6
EDUCATION (Cheap Edition)	2	6
ESSAYS. 3 Vols. ... ... 30s. (or each Vol. 10s.)
FACTS AND COMMENTS	6	0
VARIOUS FRAGMENTS. Enlarged Edition ...	6	0
SOCIAL STATICS AND MAN v. STATE	10	0
MAN v. STATE (Separately)	1	0
AGAINST THE METRIC SYSTEM. Third Edition, with Additions	0	3

DESCRIPTIVE SOCIOLOGY.

COMPILED AND ABSTRACTED BY
Dr. DUNCAN, Dr. SCHEPPIG, & Mr. COLLIER.
Folio, Boards.

1. ENGLISH	18s.
2. ANCIENT AMERICAN RACES ...	16s.
3. LOWEST RACES, NEGRITOS, POLYNESIANS	18s.
4. AFRICAN RACES	16s.
5. ASIATIC RACES	18s.
6. AMERICAN RACES	18s.
7. HEBREWS AND PHŒNICIANS ...	21s.
8. FRENCH	30s.

In Preparation.

Edited by HENRY R. TEDDER, Secretary and Librarian of the Athenæum Club.

CHINESE. Compiled and Abstracted by E. T. C. WERNER, H.M.'s Consular Service, China.

ANCIENT EGYPTIANS.

HELLENIC GREEKS. By Rev. Dr. J. P. MAHAFFY, and Professor W. A. GOLIGHER, Trinity College, Dublin.

HELLENISTIC GREEKS. By the same.

ROMANS. By Mr. E. H. ALTON, F.T.C.D., and Professor W. A. GOLIGHER.

FIFTH AND ENLARGED EDITION.

THE PHILOSOPHY COMPLETED.

8vo, Cloth, 21s.

DIGEST OF HERBERT SPENCER'S WORKS.

AN EPITOME OF THE SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY.

By F. HOWARD COLLINS.
With a Preface by the late HERBERT SPENCER.

SEND FOR ANNOUNCEMENT LIST—

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

14, HENRIETTA ST., COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

Reminiscences of an Old Sportsman. By W. B. Woodgate. (Nash. 15s. net.)
A Favourite of Napoleon. Edited by Paul Cheramy. (Nash. 10s. net.)
The Life of Canon Fleming. By the Rev. A. Finlayson. (Nisbet. 6s. net.)
Argyll Papers. A Volume of Family Papers, collected and compiled by His Grace the Duke of Argyll. (Nisbet. 16s. net.)
Memories of Horatius Bonar. By Relatives and Public Men. (Oliphant, Anderson. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Romance of Fra Filippo Lippi. By A. J. Anderson. (Paul. 10s. 6d. net.)
Reminiscences of My Life. By Sir Charles Santley. (Pitman. 16s. net.)
Makers of National History: A Series of Historical Biographies. Edited by W. H. Hutton. Francis Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester. (1662-1732.) By Canon Beeching. (Pitman. 3s. 6d. net.)
Life of Johann Sebastian Bach. By Sir C. Hubert H. Parry. (Putnam. 6s. net.)
Heroes of the Nations: William the Conqueror, and the Rule of the Normans. By F. M. Stenton. Charles the Bold, Last Duke of Burgundy, 1433-1477. By Ruth Putnam. (Putnam. 5s. each.)
Mirabeau and the French Revolution. By Fred M. Fling. In 3 parts. Part I., The Youth of Mirabeau. (Putnam. 15s. net.)
Bartholomew de Las Casas: His Life, His Apostolate, and His Writings. By Francis A. MacNutt. (Putnam.)
Madame, Mother of the Regent. By Arvède Barine. (Putnam. 12s. 6d.)
John Calvin: The Man and His Work. By the Rev. C. H. Irwin. (Religious Tract Society. 2s. 6d.)
The Life of George Grenfell, Congo Missionary and Explorer. By the Rev. George Hawker. (Religious Tract Society. 6s. net.)
Thomas Chatterton. By Charles E. Russell. (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. net.)
Sixty Years in the Wilderness. By Henry W. Lucy. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)
A Memoir of Sir Wilfrid Lawson. By George W. E. Russell. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Wander Years, Being Some Account of Journeys Into Life, Letters, and Art. By J. H. Yoxall. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)
Pre-Tractarian Oxford: A Reminiscence of the Oriel "Noetics." By the Rev. W. Tuckwell. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
A Bishop in the Rough. Edited by the Rev. D. Wallace Duthie. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
Lord Haliburton: A Memoir of His Public Services. By J. B. Atlay. (Smith, Elder. 8s. 6d. net.)
Men and Manners of Old Florence. By Guido Biagi. (Unwin. 15s. net.)
The Birth of Modern Italy. The Posthumous Papers of Jessie White Mario. Edited by the Duke Litta-Visconti-Arese. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
Notes by the Way. With Memoirs of Joseph Knight and Woodfall Ebbsworth. By John Collins Francis. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
Sir Randal Cremer: A Biography. By Howard Evans. (Unwin. 5s.)
Eliza Brightwen: The Life and Thoughts of a Naturalist. Edited by W. H. Chesson. Introduction by Edmund Gosse. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
The Right Honorable Spencer Perceval. By Philip Treherne. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
Joseph Skipsey. By the Right Hon. Robert S. Watson. (Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

CLASSICAL LITERATURE AND PHILOLOGY.

The Acharnians of Aristophanes. Edited by W. Rennie. (Arnold. 6s. net.)
M. Tullii Ciceronis de Finibus Bonorum et Malorum Libri Quinque. With introduction by W. M. L. Hutchinson. (Arnold. 8s. 6d. net.)
The Elegies of Theognis. Edited by T. Hudson Williams. (Bell.)
A Post Augustan Latin Reader. By W. King Gillies. (Bell.)
Bell's Illustrated Classics:
Virgil: Aeneid, Books VIII. and IX. Edited by L. D. Wainwright.
Cæsar's Invasion of Britain. Selected from De Bello Gallico. Books IV. and V. Edited by the Rev. A. Upcott and A. Reynolds. (Bell. 1s. 6d. each.)
Bell's Classical Translations:
Homer's Iliad. Books IX. and X. Translated by S. H. Blakeney.
Æschylus' Persians and Seven Against Thebes. Translated by C. E. S. Headlam. 2 vols. (Bell. 1s. each.)
The Acharnians of Aristophanes. Edited by W. J. M. Starkie. (Macmillan.)
The Annals of Tacitus. Book VII.—End. An English Translation. By George G. Ramsay. (Murray. 15s. net.)
Orationes tum Creweianæ tum Gratulatoriæ in Theatro Sheldoniano plerumque habitæ. Auctore W. W. Merry. (Oxford University Press.)
Aristotle's Poetics. By I. Bywater. (Oxford University Press.)
Aristotle's Poetics. A revised Greek text by I. Bywater. (Oxford University Press.)
Plato's Theory of Ideas. By J. A. Stewart. (Oxford University Press.)
Oxford Classical Texts:
Theophrastus. Edited by H. Diels.
Euripides. Vol. III. Edited by Gilbert Murray.
Cicero, Orations. Edited by A. C. Clark.
(Oxford University Press.)
Notes on the Attic Comedy. By Herbert Richards. (Grant Richards. 6s. net.)

COUNTRY LIFE.

"The Greenfinch" Cruise: A Cure for All Ills. By the Rev. F. C. Kempson. (Arnold. 5s. net.)
Modern Golf. By P. A. Vaile. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Motor Routes of England. A Guide to the beautiful scenery and interesting localities in the country. Southern Section (South of the Thames). By Gordon Home. (Black. 5s. net.)
An Angler's Season. By W. Earl Hodgson. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)
Gardening in the North. By S. Arnott and R. P. Brotherston. (Cassell. 2s. net.)
The Nature Book: A Book for those who would know the joys of the Open Air. With an Introduction on The Love of Nature. By Walter Crane. In 2 vols. (Cassell. 12s. net each.)
The Biography of a Silver Fox. By Ernest Thompson Seton. (Constable. 5s. net.)
Trees and Shrubs of the British Isles. By C. S. Cooper and W. P. Westell. In 16 parts. (Dent. 1s. net.)
Animals and Their Ways. By Ernest Evans. (Dent.)
Dent's Open Air Nature Books:
The Hedge I Know. Edited by W. P. Westell and H. E. Turner. (Dent.)
Our Forests and Woodlands. By Dr. J. Nisbet. (Dent. 3s. 6d. net.)
Camps and Cruises of an Ornithologist. By Frank M. Chapman. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)
The Woman in the Car. A Guide for Women Motorists. By Dorothy Levitt. (Lane. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Complete Hockey Player. By Eustace E. White. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
The Complete Wild-Fowler Ashore and Afloat. By Guy Thorne and Stanley Duncan. (Grant Richards. 15s. net.)
The Sport of Bird Study. By Herbert K. Job. (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Balance of Nature and Modern Conditions of Cultivation. By George Abbey. (Routledge. 7s. 6d. net.)

MESSRS. CONSTABLE'S SPRING BOOKS

The Romantic Movement in English Poetry. By ARTHUR SYMONS. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Plays, Acting, and Music. A Book of Theory by ARTHUR SYMONS. Crown 8vo, 6s. net. [Shortly.

The Valley of Shadows. By FRANCIS GRIERSON, Author of "Modern Mysticism," and "The Celtic Temperament." Extra Crown 8vo, 6s. net. [Next week.

Six Masters in Disillusion. By ALGAR THOROLD. Crown 8vo, 6s. net. Penetrating studies of ANATOLE FRANCE, HUYSMANS, MAETERLINCK, FONTENELLE, MERIMEE, and FABRE. [Next week.

Personal Recollections of Wagner. By ANGELO NEUMANN. Translated from the Fourth German Edition. With Portraits and one of Wagner's Letters in Facsimile. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready.

The Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth: A Narrative in Contemporary Letters. By F. A. MUMBY, Editor of "The Letters of Literary Men." With an Introduction by R. S. RAIT, M.A., Fellow of New College, Oxford. With numerous Portraits, Views, and Facsimiles. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

An Historical Introduction to the Marprelate Tracts. By WILLIAM PIERCE. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready.

The Story of the Household Cavalry—1861-1902. By CAPTAIN SIR GEORGE ARTHUR, BART., late Second Life Guards. With Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations, including Six Coloured Plates. Two vols. Super Royal 8vo. Edition de Luxe, limited to 35 copies, £10 10s. net. Ordinary Edition, £3 13s. 6d. net.

Glimpses of the Twenties. By WILLIAM TOYNBEE, Author of "Vignettes of the Regency." With Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 Plates. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Next week.

Æneas Silvius (Enea Silvio de Piccolomini—Pius II.), Orator, Man of Letters, Statesman, and Pope. By WILLIAM BOULTING. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Ready.

The Last Days of Papal Rome. By R. DE CESARE, Author of "Last Days of the Kingdom of Naples." Translated from the Italian by Miss HELEN ZIMMERN. Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Famous Women of Florence. By EDGCUMBE STALEY, Author of "The Guilds of Florence." Photogravure Frontispiece and 7 Plates. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Contemporary France. By GABRIEL HANOTAUX. Volume IV.—1877-1900. Translated from the French. Demy 8vo. With Portraits. 15s. net.

Racial Problems in Hungary. By "SCOTUS VIATOR" (R. W. SETON-WATSON). Demy 8vo, xxviii., 540 pages. With 42 Illustrations of Peasant Art and Costume, including Six in Colour, and a Map of Hungary. Price 16s. net. [Ready.

Economic Heresies; Being an Unorthodox Attempt to appreciate the Economic Problems presented by "Things as They Are." By SIR NATHANIEL NATHAN. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Next week.

English Heraldic Book Stamps: Figured and Described. By CYRIL DAVENPORT, F.S.A. Super Royal 8vo. Illustrations. 25s. net.

Historic Roman Coins. By G. F. HILL, Author of "Historic Greek Coins." Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

FORTHCOMING NOVELS

FRANKFORT MOORE
Priscilla and Ch

ALICE BROWN
The Story of Thyrza.

W. E. NORRIS
The Perjurer.

LOUISE CLOSSER HALE
The Actress.

VINCENTE IBANEZ
The Shadow of the Cathedral.

H. M. RIDEOUT
Dragon's Blood.

R. W. CHAMBERS
The King in Yellow. [New Edition,

New Books by Bernard Shaw

The Doctor's Dilemma and Getting Married.
1 Vol. 6s. With two prefaces.

John Bull's Other Island. In Four Acts
Paper, 1s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net.

Major Barbara. In Three Acts.
Paper, 1s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net.

The Admirable Bashville and How He Lied to Her Husband.
Paper, 1s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net.

A Concordance to the English Poems of Thomas Gray.
Edited by ALBERT A. COOK. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Porcelain: Oriental, Continental, and British. A book of Handy Reference for Collectors.
By R. L. HOBSON. 49 Plates. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

The Biography of a Silver Fox.
By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON. With numerous Illustrations by the Author. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

University Administration.
By CHARLES W. ELIOT, President of the Harvard University. Crown 8vo, 6s. net. [Ready.

National Independence; or, a Common-Sense Policy.
By FRANCIS FRANCIS. Feap. 8vo, Cloth, 1s. net; paper, 6d. net. [Ready.

Ideas of a Plain Country Woman.
By the "Country Contributor." Crown 8vo, 235 pages, 3s. net.

The Dominion of Dreams.
By FIONA MACLEOD. A new edition in Pocket Form. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

Spring List on application

10 Orange Street Leicester Square LONDON "The Country Home"

Birds and Their Nests and Eggs In and Around Great Towns. By Dr. G. Vos. In 3 Series. Series III. (Routledge. 1s.)
British Mountaineering: A Practical Handbook. By C. E. Benson. (Routledge. 5s.)
The Fern Paradise. By Francis G. Heath. (Routledge.)
That Rock Garden of Ours. By Prof. F. E. Hulme. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

An Introduction to American Literature. By Henry S. Pancoast. (Bell. 4s. 6d.)
Plays of Our Forefathers. By C. M. Gayley. (Chatto & Windus. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Romantic Movement in English Poetry. By Arthur Symons. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
Six Masters in Disillusion. By Algar Thorold. (Constable. 6s. net.)
Essays in Freedom. By H. W. Nevinson. (Duckworth. 6s.)
On the Nature of Lyric. By Gerald Gould. (Quain Essay.) (Fifield. 2s. net.)
Literatures of the World. Edited by Edmund Gosse. German Literature. By Calvin Thomas. (Heinemann. 6s.)
A History of Story-Telling. By Arthur Ransome. (Jack.)
In Re Shakespeare Problem. Beeching v. Greenwood. The Defendant's Reply. By G. G. Greenwood, M.P. (Lane. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Springs of Helicon: A Study in the Progress of English Poetry from Chaucer to Milton. By J. W. Mackail. (Longmans, Green.)
Oxford Lectures on Poetry. By A. C. Bradley. (Macmillan.)
The Music of Speech. Containing the Words of Some Poets, Thinkers, and Music Makers Regarding the Practice of the Bardic Art. By Florence Farr. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
Dante in English Literature. By Paget Toynbee. (Methuen. 21s. net.)
Six Oxford Thinkers: Gibbon, Newman, Froude, Church, Morley, Pater. By Algernon Cecil. (Murray.)
Essays on Poets and Poetry. By T. Herbert Warren. (Murray.)
Scenes and Portraits. By Frederic Manning. (Murray.)
Milton Memorial Lectures read before the Royal Society of Literature. Edited by P. W. Ames. (Oxford University Press.)
The Forerunners of Dante. Edited by A. J. Butler. (Oxford University Press.)
The Letters of Percy Bysshe Shelley. Edited by Roger Ingpen. (Pitman. 21s. net.)
Revaluations. By A. W. Benn. (Rationalist Press Association.)
Literary By-Paths of Old England. By Henry C. Shelley. (Grant Richards. 10s. 6d. net.)
Material and Methods of Fiction. By Clayton Hamilton. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)
The Dickens Dictionary. By Alex. J. Philip. (Routledge. 8s. 6d. net.)
First English Translations of the Great Foreign Classics. By W. J. Harris. (Routledge. 2s. 6d.)
Sainte-Beuve: Causeries du Lundi. Translated by Prof. E. J. Trechmann. Series I. October, 1849, to March, 1850. (Routledge. 1s. net.)
A Literary History of the English People. Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. II. By J. J. Jusserand. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Library of Literary History. A Literary History of Rome. By J. Wright Duff. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

DRAMA.

The Doctor's Dilemma and Getting Married. With Two Prefaces. By Bernard Shaw. (Constable. 6s.)
Plays: "The Silver Box," "Joy," "Strife." By John Galsworthy. (Duckworth. 6s.)
Great Actors of the Eighteenth Century. By Karl Mantzius. (Vol. V. of "A History of Theatrical Art.") (Duckworth. 10s. net.)
The Thunderbolt. In 4 acts. By Arthur W. Pinero. (Heinemann. 1s. 6d.)
Seven Short Plays, by Lady Gregory, with a portrait by Manchini. Spreading the News; Hyacinth Halvey; Workhouse Ward; The Jackdaw; The Rising of the Moon; The Travelling Man; and The Gaol Gate. (Maunsel.)
The Blue Bird: A Fairy Play in Five Acts. By Maurice Maeterlinck. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.)
The Appreciation of the Drama. By Charles and Caroline A. Caffin. (Paul. 7s. 6d. net.)
Three Plays by H. Granville Barker:—
1. The Marrying of Ann Leete.
2. The Voysey Inheritance.
3. Waste.
(Sidgwick and Jackson. 5s. net.)

EDUCATIONAL.

A Brief Course in Economics. By Henry R. Seager. (Bell.)
Mason's New English Grammars. Mason's Senior English Grammar. (Bell. 3s. 6d.)
Bell's Illustrated French Readers. Tales by Erckmann-Chatrian. (Second Series.) Edited by Oliver H. Prior. (Bell. 1s.)
Mackay and Curtis' French Course. By D. Mackay and J. F. Curtis.
First French Book. (Bell. 1s. net.)
Second French Book. (Bell. 1s. 6d. net.)
Teachers' Handbook. (Bell. 1s. net.)
Subject Wall Picture. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)
Bell's First German Reader. By L. B. T. Chaffey. (Bell.)
A Spanish Primer. By the Rev. A. C. Clapin. (Bell. 1s.)
Practical Solid Geometry. By the Rev. P. W. Unwin. Part I. (Bell.)
Elementary Mechanics. By C. M. Jessop and F. N. Havelock. (Bell.)
Geographical Diagrams and Land Forms: Senior. By H. J. Snape.
Book I.—British Isles.
Book II.—North America and Eurasia.
Book III.—South America, Africa, Australasia.
(Black. 1s. 4d. each.)
Descriptive Geography of the British Isles. By F. D. Herbertson. (Black. 2s. 6d.)
English History Illustrated from Original Sources, 1715-1815. By H. A. Henderson. (Black. 2s. 6d.)
The Place of History in Education. By J. W. Allen. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)
Ruskin Nature Readers. Intermediate Book. By G. R. Bennett. (Dent. 1s. 9d.)
Scientific Primers:
Biology. By Prof. Harvey Gibson.
Chemistry. By Prof. Tilden.
Botany. By J. Reynolds Green.
(Dent. 1s. net per vol.)
The English Scholarship System, in its Relation with the Secondary Schools for Boys and Girls. By M. E. Sadler and H. Bompas Smith. (Longmans, Green.)
Outlines of Physical Chemistry. By George Senter, D.Sc. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)
French and English Parallels. By F. R. M. Fursdon. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.)
Methuen's Simplified German Texts.
Der Müller Am Rhein. Adapted by Miss A. F. Ryan.
Undine und Huldbrand. Adapted by T. R. N. Crofts, M.A.
Die Geschichte von Peter Schlemihl. Adapted by R. C. Perry. (Methuen. 1s. each.)
Murray's French Texts. Edited by W. G. Hartog.
La Vénus D'Ille et la Dame de Pique. Par Prosper Mérimée. (Murray. 1s. 6d.)
Japanese Education. By Baron Dairoku Kikuchi. (Murray.)

From Messrs. Routledge's List.

A DICKENS DICTIONARY. The Characters and Scenes of the Novels and Miscellaneous Works alphabetically arranged. By ALEX. J. PHILIP. Demy 8v, cloth extra, gilt, gilt top and headband, 8s. 6d. net.

Companion Volume to John's "Wild Flowers."

BRITISH BIRDS IN THEIR HAUNTS. By the late REV. C. A. JOHNS. Revised and Edited throughout by J. A. OWEN, Author of "Birds in their Seasons"; collaborator with "A Son of the Marshes." With 64 full-page Coloured Plates (256 figures) drawn from Life by WILLIAM FOSTER. Medium 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

THE BALANCE OF NATURE, and Modern Conditions of Cultivation: a Practical Manual of Animal Foes and Friends for the Country Gentleman, the Farmer, the Forester, the Gardener and the Sportsman. By GEORGE ABBEY. With 150 Diagrammatic Drawings, including 51 of traps. Medium 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

A SHAKESPEARE WORD-BOOK. By JOHN FOSTER, M.A. Medium 8vo, half morocco, gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

Prof. EDWARD DOWDEN writes:—"One of the special distinctions of the book lies in its tracings of the ramifications of meaning, and I think there is a delightful training of the mind in following its guidance here. But, apart from this, as a mere swift aid in getting past difficulties in reading Shakespeare, it will be most useful, and all the more useful because of its condensation."

Library Edition of "The Barchester Novels."
(Six Volumes.)

THE WARDEN. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. With 8 Full-page Plates by F. C. TILNEY. Large 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 5s.

BARCHESTER TOWERS. By the same. With 8 Full-page Plates by F. C. TILNEY. Large 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 5s.

DOCTOR THORNE. By the same. With 8 Full-page Plates by H. L. SHINDLER. Large 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 5s.

FRAMLEY PARSONAGE. By the same. With the Original Plates by Sir J. E. MILLAIS, Bart., P.R.A. Large 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 5s. [March.

 Prospectus on application.

PASSING ENGLISH OF THE VICTORIAN ERA: A Dictionary of Heterodox English, Slang, and Phrase. By J. REDDING-WARE. Large 8vo, half morocco, gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

 This work forms a Companion Volume to Farmer & Henley's "Dictionary of Slang and Colloquial English" in the same series.

SHAKESPEARE FOR HOME READING. Edited by K. HARVEY.

The purpose of this series is sufficiently explained by its title. The Author aims at rendering Shakespeare's most suitable plays in a form most suitable for home reading. Where necessary, she writes-in a little, so as to supply the lacunæ filled up in an acting version on the stage; and where necessary, she writes-out a little, so as to omit undesirable passages or passages too difficult for younger readers. The first two volumes (now ready) are:—

The Merchant of Venice. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. net.
A Midsummer Night's Dream. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. net.
Hamlet and As You Like It in the Press

THE STORY OF LIBRARIES AND BOOK-COLLECTING. By ERNEST A. SAVAGE, Librarian, Wallasey Public Libraries. Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

"A welcome little summary, covering the history in European countries and from the earliest times . . . Includes enough information for the Library Association Professional Examination (Section V., a)."—The Times Literary Supplement.

BRITISH MOUNTAINEERING. With 37 Illustrations. By C. E. BENSON, of the Climbers' and Yorkshire Ramblers' Clubs. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, rounded corners, 5s.

"A practical, concise, but fully detailed and agreeably written guide."—The Times Literary Supplement.

LATER RECITATIONS IN VERSE. Being a Supplement to "The Reciter's Treasury." By ERNEST PERTWEE, Professor of Elocution at the City of London Schools. Large 8vo, half-bound, gilt, 2s. 6d.

ST. NICOTINE, or THE PEACE PIPE, a Symposium on Tobacco. By EDWARD VINCENT HEWARD. With 4 full-page Plates and 5 Text-cuts. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt, 5s. net.

New Volume in "The Muses Library."

POEMS of EDGAR ALLAN POE. With a Sketch of the Author. By JOHN INGRAM, Author of The Life, Letters, and Opinions of Edgar Allan Poe. Fcap 8vo, cloth, 1s. net; royal blue leather, 1s. 6d. net; lambskin, 2s. net.

New Volume in the "Miniature Reference Library."

A DICTIONARY of PHILOSOPHICAL TERMS. By ARTHUR BUTLER, 32mo, morocco, 1s. net.

"The man who wants to know everything, and cannot afford a great library, should get this series of admirable pocket-books."
—Daily Mail.

 Prospectuses on application.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LIMITED,
BROADWAY HOUSE, CARTER LANE, E.C.

A SELECTION FROM

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S

SPRING LIST.

PEPYS. By PERCY LUBBOCK. A New Volume of "Literary Lives," edited by W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. With Photogravure Frontispiece and Illustrations. Price 3/6

NINETEENTH CENTURY TEACHERS AND OTHER ESSAYS. By JULIA WEDGWOOD. Price 10/6 net.

THE POLITICAL FUTURE OF INDIA. A Study of the Aspirations of Educated Indians. By H. P. MODY (Bombay). Price 3/6 net.

A CHRONICLE OF FRIENDSHIPS. By WILL H. LOW. With Illustrations by the Author and from his Collection.

Robert Louis Stevenson, R. A. M. Stevenson, and Will H. Low were three close friends. The story of their life in Paris, and of their happy questioning youth, is fully told here for the first time.

Price 15/- net.

MOTOR TOURS IN YORKSHIRE. By MRS. RODOLPH STAWELL. A Companion Volume to "Motor Tours in Wales and the Border Counties." With 48 Illustrations from Photographs. Price 5/- net.

FLORIDA ENCHANTMENTS. By A. W. and JULIAN A. DIMOCK. With Numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Price 12/- net

THE LAST OF THE PLAINSMEN. By ZANE GREY. Illustrated. Price 7/6

THE TENT DWELLERS. By ALBERT BIGELOW PAINE, Author of "The Van Dwellers," etc. Illustrated. Price 6/-

CAMP AND TRAIL. By STEWART EDWARD WHITE, Author of "The Silent Places," "The Forest," etc. Illustrated. Price 6/-

CAMPS AND CRUISES OF AN ORNITHOLOGIST. By FRANK M. CHAPMAN. With Frontispiece in Colour and about 250 Illustrations from Photographs. Price 12/- net.

NEW FICTION.

QUEEN KATE	By Charles Garvice	6/-
A FAIR REFUGEE	By Morice Gerard	6/-
ROSE OF THE WILDERNESS	By S. R. Crockett	6/-
JOLLY IN GERMANY	By Arthur E. Copping	6/-
KINCAID'S BATTERY	By G. W. Cable	6/-
THE FIRST STONE	By Mary Stuart Boyd	6/-
THE HAND OF THE SPOILER	By G. Sidney Paternoster	6/-
THE SCRIBBLERS' CLUB	By Charles Garvice	1/- net.
OH! CHRISTINA!	By J. J. Bell	1/- net.

Complete detailed list post free on application to

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Warwick Sq., London, E.C.

Elements of Non-Euclidean Geometry. By B. J. L. Coolidge. (Oxford University Press.)
The Beginnings in the Teaching of Modern Subjects in England. By Foster Watson. (Pitman. 6s. net.)
A First Welsh Reader and Writer. By E. Anwyl and the Rev. H. M. Jones. (Sonnenschein.)
A Greek Grammar: Syntax. By Dr. Gustave Simonson. (Sonnenschein.)
A Series of French Texts. Edited by Prof. M. A. Gerothwohl:—
1. Molière: Don Juan. By the Editor.
2. Montaigne: Selections. By Prof. Salmon.
3. Lesage: Turcaret. By Prof. Oger.
4. Saint Simon: Selections. By Prof. Sarolia.
5. Beaumarchais: Marriage de Figaro. By E. Renault.
6 La Satire Menippée. By P. Demey. (Sonnenschein.)

FICTION.

These Little Ones. Studies of Child Life. By E. Nesbit. (Allen. 6s.)
Wax. By G. Somes Layard. (Allen. 6s.)
Seekers. A Romance of the Balkans. By Frank Savile. (Arnold. 6s.)
Margery Pigeon. By Jane Wardle. (Arnold. 6s.)
The New June. By Henry Newbolt. (Blackwood. 6s.)
Marcia: A Transcript from Life. By Marguerite Curtis. (Blackwood. 6s.)
Cecilia Kirkham's Son. By Mrs. Kenneth Combe. (Blackwood. 6s.)
The Silver Spoon. By G. H. Stevenson. (Blackwood. 6s.)
The Happy Elopement. By E. H. Lacon Watson. (Brown, Langham. 6s.)
Daphne, or "Marriage à la Mode." By Mrs. Humphry Ward. (Cassell. 6s.)
The Yellow God. An Idol of Africa. By H. Rider Haggard. (Cassell. 6s.)
The Love-Brokers. By Albert Kinross. (Cassell. 6s.)
The Compact. The Story of an unrecorded South African Conspiracy. By Ridgwell Cullum. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
The City of Beautiful Nonsense. (By E. Temple Thurston. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
Magnificat. By Vincent Brown. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
The June Princess. By Constance Smedley. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)
The Merry Heart. By Frank A. Swinnerton. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)
A Castle of Dreams. By Netta Syrett. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)
The Story of Thyrza. By Alice Brown. (Constable. 6s.)
The Perjurer. By W. E. Norris. (Constable. 6s.)
The Actress. By Louise Closser Hale. (Constable. 6s.)
The Cathedral. By Vincento Ibañez. Translated from the Spanish by Mrs. W. A. Gillespie. (Constable. 6s.)
The King in Yellow. By R. W. Chambers. (Constable. 6s.)
Elizabeth's Visits in America. By Elinor Glyn. (Duckworth. 6s.)
The Infamous John Friend. By Mrs. R. S. Garnett. (Duckworth. 6s.)
The Old Man in the Corner. By Baroness Orczy. (Greening. 6s.)
Little France, or the Quiberon Touch. By Cyrus T. Brady. (Greening. 6s.)
Sweet Isabel of Narragoon. By Lionel Laggard. (Greening. 6s.)
The White Prophet. By Hall Caine. (Heinemann.)
Blind Jim. By William de Morgan. (Heinemann.)
Uncle Gregory. By George Sandeman. (Heinemann.)
Fraternity. By John Galsworthy. (Heinemann.)
Queen Kate. By Charles Garvice. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
A Fair Refugee. By Morice Gerard. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
Jolly in Germany. By Arthur E. Copping. Illustrated by Will Owen. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
Peter. By F. Hopkinson Smith. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
The Royal End. By Henry Harland. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
A Simple Savage. By G. B. Burgin. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
The Three Brothers. By Eden Phillpotts. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
Green Ginger. By Arthur Morrison. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
The End of the Road. By Stanley Portal Hyatt. (Werner Laurie. 6s.)
The Isle of Lies. By M. P. Shiel. (Werner Laurie. 6s.)
Polly Winford: A Novel. By Eyre Hussey. (Longmans, Green.)
Tono-Bungay. By H. G. Wells. (Macmillan. 6s.)
Jimbo. A Fantasy. By Algernon Blackwood. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d. net.)
Barbary Sheep. By Robert Hichens. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)
The Love Story of St. Bel. By Bernard Capes. (Methuen. 6s.)
My Lady of Shadows. By John Oxenham. (Methuen. 6s.)
The Flower of the Heart. By H. B. Marriott Watson. (Methuen. 6s.)
Brothers All: More Stories of Dutch Peasant Life. By Maarten Maartens. (Methuen. 6s.)
The Gifted Family. By Barry Pain. (Methuen. 6s.)
The Archdeacon's Family. By Mrs. Maud Egerton King. (Murray. 6s.)
Septimus. By William J. Locke. (Murray. 6s.)
Ione Chaloner. By the Earl of Iddesleigh. (Murray. 6s.)
Out in the Open. By Lucas Malet. (Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)
When a Woman Woos. By Charles Marriott. (Nash. 6s.)
After the Pardon. By Matilde Serao. (Nash. 6s.)
The Half Moon. By F. M. Hueffer. (Nash. 6s.)
Banzai. By "Parabellum." (Paul. 6s.)
An Adventure in Exile. By Richard Duffy. (Paul. 6s.)
The Trickster. By G. B. Burgin. (Paul. 6s.)
The Making of a Woman. By Amy Le Feuvre. (Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)
The Cossart Cousins. By Evelyn Everett-Green. (Religious Tract Society. 2s. 6d.)
The Last Days of John Hus. (A Historical Romance.) Translated from the original Cech. With introduction by Professor W. R. Morfill. (Religious Tract Society. 2s. 6d.)
The Dartmoor House that Jack Built. By John Trevena. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)
Salome and the Head. By E. Nesbit. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)
Sparrows: The Story of an Unprotected Girl. By Horace W. C. Newte. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)
The Doctor's Lass. By E. C. Booth. (Grant Richards. 6s.)
Antonio. By Ernest Oldmeadow. (Grant Richards. 6s.)
The Last Persecution. By S. N. Sedgwick. (Grant Richards. 6s.)
Multitude and Solitude. By John Masefield. (Grant Richards. 6s.)
Nightshade. By Roy Horniman. (Sisley. 6s.)
The Innocence of Isobel. By Winifred Wynne. (Sisley. 6s.)
With Powder-Puff and Dagger. By May I. Fisk. (Sisley. 6s.)
Teresa. By Edith Ayrton Zangwill. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
Dorrien Carfax: A Game of Hide-and-Seek. By Nowell Griffyth. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
The Flying Months. By Frances M. Peard. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
Geoffrey Cheriton. By John Barnett. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
Araminta. By J. C. Snaith. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
The Stronger Wings. By A. Jeans. (Elliot Stock. 6s.)
Agnes. A Romance of the Siege of Paris. By Jules Claretie. Translated by Ada S. Flood. (Elliot Stock. 3s. 6d.)
The Canon's Dilemma, and other Stories. By Victor L. Whitechurch. (Unwin. 6s.)
Transplanted Daughters. By Mrs. Burton Harrison. (Unwin. 6s.)
High Life in the Far East. By James Dalziel. (Unwin. 6s.)
The Capture of Paul Beck. By M. McDonnell Bodkin. (Unwin. 6s.)

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

HISTORICAL PORTRAITS. Richard II. to Henry Wriothesley, 1400-1600. The Lives by C. R. L. Fletcher. The Portraits chosen by Emery Walker. With an introduction on the History of Portraiture in England. With 103 Portraits.
Crown 4to, 8s. 6d. net.

A HISTORY OF CANADA, 1763-1812. By Sir C. P. Lucas, K.C.M.G. With 8 Maps.
8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
Birmingham Post.—"An achievement which entitles the author to the admiring congratulations of students of our imperial history."

THE CANADIAN WAR OF 1812. By the same Author. With 8 Maps.
8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

WELSH MEDIEVAL LAW. Being a Text of the Laws of Howell the Good, namely the British Museum Harleian MS. 4353 of the 13th Century, with Translation, Introduction, Appendix, Glossary, Index, and a Map. By A. W. Wade-Evans.
Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.
Scotsman.—"Mr. Wade-Evans has earned the gratitude of all Celtic scholars, and especially of such as are interested in studying the political history of Wales, by producing this primitive monument of jurisprudence in a form which leaves nothing undone to make it fully available for the uses of modern scholarship. . . . The volume forms an important contribution to the literature of Welsh history."

A NATURALIST IN TASMANIA. By Geoffrey Smith. With 33 Plates, 4 Text Figures, and a Folding Map showing the Geological Features of the Island.
8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
Times.—"The book furnishes a good sketch of the natural history of Tasmania. . . . The illustrations, good in themselves, are excellently selected to elucidate the text; and the style of writing is in every respect superior to that of most books of travel or of natural history."

RHODES OF THE KNIGHTS. By Baron De Belabre. With a Frontispiece in Chromo-Collotype and 188 Maps. Inscriptions, Shields, and Photographs in the Text.
Demy 4to, £1 11s. 6d. net.
Times.—"With its really splendid photographic reproductions, about one hundred and fifty in number, its coloured frontispiece, and its numerous armorial drawings, this large quarto would make a fine gift book, and open the eyes of many who would extol much less majestic medieval remains in Europe."

THE MORAL SYSTEM OF DANTE'S INFERNO. By W. H. V. Reade.
8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

POST-AUGUSTAN POETRY: from Seneca to Juvenal. By H. E. Butler.
8vo, 8s. 6d. net.
Scotsman.—"Mr. Butler's work, marked by a sympathetic understanding of his authors, a matured taste in estimating the characteristic beauties of Latin poetry, and no small expository skill in advantageously setting forth the matter and picking out the best pieces in the old masterpieces, forms a valuable introduction to the more intimate study of this body of literature, and will be read with interest by all sorts of classical scholars."

THE INTERPRETATION OF ANCIENT GREEK LITERATURE. An Inaugural Lecture delivered before the University of Oxford. By Gilbert Murray.
8vo, 1s. net.

THE VALUE OF BYZANTINE AND MODERN GREEK IN HELLENIC STUDIES. An Inaugural Lecture delivered before the University of Oxford. By S. Menardos.
8vo, 1s. net.

EDWARD HYDE, EARL OF CLARENDON, as Statesman, Historian, and Chancellor of the University. By C. H. Firth.
8vo, 1s. net.

HENRY BIRKHEAD AND THE FOUNDATION OF THE OXFORD CHAIR OF POETRY. By J. W. Mackail.
8vo, 1s. net.

New Volume, Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry.

THE HEROINE. By Eaton Stannard Barrett. With an Introduction by Walter Raleigh.
Fcap. 8vo, from 2s. 6d. net.

COMPLETE CATALOGUE POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

LONDON:
HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD'S LIST

NEW NOVELS.

By the Author of "The Artistic Temperament."

MARGERY PIGEON.

By JANE WARDLE. 6s. [March 12th.

By the Author of "The Desert Venture."

SEEKERS.

A Romance of the Balkans.

By FRANK SAVILE. 6s.

Second Large Impression.

A ROOM WITH A VIEW.

By E. M. FORSTER. 6s.

Spectator.—"Mr. Forster's new novel is not only much the best of the three he has written, but it clearly admits him to the limited class of writers who stand above and apart from the manufacturers of contemporary fiction."

NEW BOOKS TO BE PUBLISHED IN MARCH.

FIVE MONTHS IN THE HIMALAYAS.

By A. L. MUMM, formerly Secretary of the Alpine Club.

Illustrated with four magnificent Panoramas, twenty-four full-page Plates, and about fifty Collotypes on India paper, mounted in the text. Super royal 8vo. 21s. net.

THE 'GREEN FINCH' CRUISE: A Cure for all Ills.

By the Rev. F. CLAUDE KEMPSON.

Fully Illustrated. Square 8vo. 5s. net.

THE DUDLEY BOOK OF COOKERY AND HOUSEHOLD RECIPES.

By GEORGIANA, COUNTESS OF DUDLEY.

Handsomely printed and bound. Large crown 8vo, gilt top. 7s. 6d. net.

Volume I. of a New Series of Climbing Guides issued by the Committee of the Climbers' Club.

CLIMBS ON LLIWEDD.

By J. M. A. THOMSON and A. W. ANDREWS.

With Illustrations and Diagrams. Bound in a waterproof cover. Royal 16mo. 5s. net.

Now Ready at all Booksellers and Libraries.

AN ENGLISHMAN'S CASTLE.

By MISS M. LOANE,

Author of "The Queen's Poor," "From their Point of View," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth. 6s.

Glasgow Herald.—"A book that should be in the hands of every social reformer The humor, sympathy and shrewd common sense with which the author sets forth some of the fruits of her keen observation during her experiences as a district nurse cannot fail to recommend this most interesting volume to popular favour."

LETTERS FROM A SETTLEMENT.

By MISS A. L. HODSON.

With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, gilt top. 4s. 6d. net.

Daily Chronicle.—"Most books about the poor are rather dismal reading, but this one is an exception. It is simply and attractively written by one who evidently brought to her work a sympathy and understanding that cannot be overpraised."

THE BODY AT WORK.

By Dr. ALEX HILL, recently Master of Downing College, Cambridge. Author of "An Introduction to Science." "The Physiologist's Notebook," &c.

440 pages with Illustrations, demy 8vo. 16s. net.

Morning Post.—"To the book itself we must refer the reader for the details and then, unless we mistake greatly, he will find much of intense interest to all thinking men."

British Medical Journal.—"Dr. Alex Hill is to be congratulated upon the admirable conception and excellent execution which has resulted in the production of his account of The Body at Work. The book satisfies a long-felt want and constitutes a text-book of physiology adapted to the use of the general public."

A TEXT-BOOK OF EXPERIMENTAL PSYCHOLOGY.

By CHARLES S. MYERS, M.A., M.D.,

Lecturer in Experimental Psychology in the University of Cambridge; Professor of Psychology in King's College, University of London.

With 66 Diagrams. 8s. 6d. net.

EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 and 43, Maddox Street, London, W.

The Duke in the Suburbs. By Edgar Wallace. (Ward, Lock.)
Money. By Mrs. Marie Connor Leighton. (Ward, Lock.)
The Socialist. By Guy Thorne. (Ward, Lock.)

HISTORY.

Mediæval Europe (A.D. 395-1270). By Charles Bemont and G. Monod. Translated under the editorship of George B. Adams. (Bell. 6s. 6d. net.)
Insurrectionary India. By Douglas Story. (Chapman & Hall. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Tower of London. Fortress, Palace, and Prison. By Charles G. Harper. (Chapman & Hall. 6s. net.)
A History of Babylonia and Assyria. By Leonard W. King.
Vol. I. A History of Sumer and Akkad.
Vol. II. A History of Babylon.
Vol. III. A History of Assyria.
(Chatto & Windus. 18s. net each vol.)
Venice in the Eighteenth Century. By Philippe Monnier. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Russian Bastille. By T. P. Youvatschev. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Third French Republic. By Ernest A. Vizetely. (Collier.)
The Marshals of Napoleon. By Percy C. Standing. (Collier.)
The Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth: A Narrative in Contemporary Letters. By F. A. Mumby. With introduction by R. S. Rait. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
An Historical Introduction to the Marprelate Tracts. By W. M. Pierce. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
The Story of the Household Cavalry, 1661-1902. By Captain Sir George Arthur. 2 vols. (Constable. £3 13s. 6d. net.)
The Last Days of Papal Rome. By R. de Cesare. Translated from the Italian by Miss Helen Zimmern. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)
Contemporary France. By Gabriel Hanotaux. Vol. IV. 1877-1900. Translated from the French. (Constable. 15s. net.)
Mediæval Town Series. Pisa. By Janet Ross and Nelly Erichsen. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)
History of Pembrokeshire. By the Rev. J. Phillips. (Elliot Stock. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Public Health Agitation, 1833-1848. By B. L. Hutchins. (Fifield. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Greatness and Decline of Rome. By Guglielmo Ferrero. Now complete in 5 vols. Vol. V. The Republic of Augustus. Translated by the Rev. H. J. Chaytor. (Heinemann. 6s. net per vol.)
The Great Revolution, 1789-1793. By Prince A. Kropotkin. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)
The New History of Methodism. Edited by W. J. Townsend, H. B. Workman, and George Eayrs. In 2 vols. (Hodder and Stoughton. 30s.)
The Reformation in Scotland. Its Causes, Characteristics, and Consequences. The Stone Lectures for 1907-1908. By Dr. Hay Fleming. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century. By Houston Stewart Chamberlain. Translated from the German by John Lees. Introduction by Lord Redesdale. 2 vols. (Lane. 25s. net.)
British Malaya. By Sir F. A. Swettenham. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Tragedy of Russia in Pacific Asia. By Frederick McCormick. 2 vols. (Grant Richards. 21s. net.)
An Anecdotal History of the Third French Republic. By Frederick Lawton. (Grant Richards. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Political History of England. Edited by the Rev. W. Hunt and Reginald L. Poole. In 12 vols.
Vol. IX.—1702 to 1760. By I. S. Leadam.
Vol. VI.—1547 to 1603. By A. F. Pollard.
Vol. VIII.—1660 to 1702. By Richard Lodge.
(Longmans, Green. 7s. 6d. net each.)
Historical Letters and Memoirs of Scottish Catholics, 1625-1793. By the Rev. W. Forbes Leith. (Longmans, Green.)
The Scottish Staple at Veere: A Study in the Economic History of Scotland. By the late John Davidson and Alexander Gray. (Longmans, Green. 12s. 6d. net.)
Ireland under the Stuarts and During the Interregnum. By Richard Bagwell. Vols. I. and II. 1603-1660. (Longmans, Green, 28s. net.)
The Curious Case of Lady Purbeck: A Scandal of the XVIIth Century. By the Author of "The Life of Sir Kenelm Digby." (Longmans, Green.)
Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero. By W. Warde Fowler. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)
The Ancient Greek Historians. (Harvard Lectures.) By J. B. Bury. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Trials of Five Queens. By R. Storry Deans. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
The Dawn of Mediæval Europe, 476-918. By J. H. B. Masterman. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)
The Central Period of the Middle Age, 918-1273. By Beatrice A. Lees, Resident History Tutor, Somerville College, Oxford. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)
The End of the Middle Age, 1273-1453. By E. C. Lodge. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)
Europe in Renaissance and Reformation, 1453-1659. By M. A. Hollings. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)
The Age of the Enlightened Despot, 1660-1789. By A. H. Johnson. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)
The Remaking of Modern Europe: From the Outbreak of the French Revolution to the Treaty of Berlin, 1789-1878. By J. A. R. Marriott. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)
A Short History of the Royal Navy. Vol. II. 1689-1815. By David Hannay. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
Original Illustrations of English Constitutional History. By D. J. Medley. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire. By T. R. Glover. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
A History of English Law. By W. S. Holdsworth. In 3 vols. Vols. II. and III. (Methuen. Each 10s. 6d. net.)
The Foundations of the English Church. By J. H. Maude. (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Saxon Church and the Norman Conquest. By C. T. Cruttwell. (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net.)
The City of Jerusalem. By Colonel C. R. Conder. (Murray.)
The Medici. By Colonel G. F. Young. 2 vols. (Murray.)
The Early History of the Church. By the Abbé L. Duchesne. (Murray.)
An Introductory History of England. By C. R. L. Fletcher. Vols. III. and IV. (Murray.)
A History of Canada, 1763-1812. By Sir C. P. Lucas. (Oxford University Press. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Cults of the Greek States. Vol. V. By L. R. Farnell. (Oxford University Press.)
Historical Essays. By the late Henry F. Pelham. Edited by F. Haverfield. (Oxford University Press.)
The English Factories in India, 1624-1629. A Calendar of Documents. By William Foster. (Oxford University Press.)
Political Annals of Canada. By A. P. Cockburn. (Paul. 10s. 6d. net.)
The English in China. By J. Bromley Eames. (Pitman. 20s. net.)
Myth, Magic, and Morals: A Study of Christian Origins. By F. C. Conybeare. (Rationalist Press Association.)
Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire: Authorised Translation of the Sittengeschichte Roms of Dr. Friedländer. Vol. II. By J. H. Freese. (Routledge. 6s.)
Chapter Records of St. George's, Windsor. Arranged by the Rev. Canon Dalton. (Sonnenschein.)
Studies in Roman History. By E. G. Hardy. (Sonnenschein.)
History and Ethnography of South Africa, 1505-1795. 3 vols.:
Vol. II. Formation of the Cape Colony by the Dutch.
Vol. III. Account of the Dutch, Portuguese, Hottentots, and Bantu. By Dr. G. M. Theal.
(Sonnenschein.)
History of Civilisation. By Charles Seignobos.
History of Contemporary Civilisation. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

"This clever and thoughtful book."—Academy.
"Imaginative and original work."—Observer.

THE HEART OF A GIPSY.

By ROSAMOND NAPIER.

A Romantic Tale of Exmoor.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Has all the colour and atmosphere of elf-land. Miss Napier has poetic and mystic imagination, and can describe country scenes and people well."—Morning Post.

FAITH.

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM, author of "Progress," "Success," "His People." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"One realises that this author stands out from among his fellows, since Stevenson died, as the embodiment of one thing in literature . . . that rare thing, charm. . . . Full of pleasing whimsicality, of literary distinction, of quaint, ironical philosophy . . . for all readers who can appreciate literary grace and ironical humour."—ATHENÆUM.

THE KISS, and other Stories.

By ANTON TCHEKHOFF. 6s.

THE SPY. A Story. By MAXIM GORKY.

In the light of recent happenings in Russia, the publication of this powerful book is remarkably opportune. 6s.

GREAT MASTERS OF DUTCH AND FLEMISH PAINTING.

By DR. W. BODE. With 48 Illustrations, pott 4to 7s. 6d. net.

 Write for a Prospectus of this important Book.

SIR RICHARD TANGYE.

By STUART J. REID, D.C.L. With Photogravure Portrait large crown, 8vo, 6s.

"An excellent portrait of a genial, public-spirited, and attractive personality. The career of a nineteenth-century captain of industry of the best type is well told by Dr. Stuart Reid."—Nation.

THE SCIENTIFIC FEEDING OF ANIMALS.

By PROFESSOR O. KELLNER. Authorised Translation by WILLIAM GOODWIN, B.Sc., Ph.D., lecturer on Agricultural Chemistry, and Head of the Chemical Department, South-Eastern Agricultural College (University of London), Wye, Kent. Crown 8vo. 404 pages. 6s. net. Full prospectus on application.

CAROTTI'S HISTORY OF ART.

Volume II., THE MIDDLE AGES, nearly ready. A History of Art, to be completed in four volumes, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By Dr. GIULIO CAROTTI of the Royal Academy in Milan and the Royal University of Rome. Edited by Mrs. S. ARTHUR STRONG, LL.D. With upwards of 500 illustrations in each volume. Small crown 8vo, 5s. net. a volume. Sold separately.

VOLUME I. NOW READY.

GREAT ACTORS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

By CARL MANTZIUS. Being Vol. V. of "A History of Theatrical Art." With 73 illustrations from Photographs, Prints, Drawings, &c. Royal 8vo, 10s. net. The period here treated of covers the time of Adrienne Le Couvreur, Voltaire, Betterton. Colley Cibber, James Quin, Ch. Macklin, and Garrick.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW.

MARCH NUMBER NOW READY.

On Sale everywhere, 2s. 6d. net; postage 4d.

Cloth, Small Crown 8vo, 1s.

SOUTH AMERICAN SKETCHES.

By W. H. HUDSON. A re-issue of a volume of sketches published in 1902 under the title of El Ombu

One Shilling Net.

DUCKWORTH & CO., COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

NEW 6/- NOVELS.

ARAMINTA.

By J. C. SNAITH, Author of "Broke of Covenden," etc.

Second Impression in the Press.

SPHERE.—"'Araminta' bids fair to be the most talked of novel of the hour . . . the best novel of 1909 by a long way."

THE MORNING POST.—"A novel which may well be the success of the spring season. Its gaiety, mostly spontaneous, its assured air of familiarity with 'the best people,' and its frank and shameless sentimentality will carry by storm the citadel of popular esteem. It is indeed an essentially jolly book."

GEOFFREY CHERITON

By JOHN BARNETT,

Author of "The Prince's Valet," etc.

NOTTINGHAM GUARDIAN:—"A story worthy to rank with the finest records of a man's self-sacrificing devotion to a friend that we have in fiction or in fact."

TERESA. By EDITH AYRTON ZANGWILL

Author of "The Barbarous Babes," "The First Mrs. Mollivar," etc.

With 9 Illustrations. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

PRE-TRACTARIAN OXFORD.

A Reminiscence of the Oriel "Noetics."

By the Rev. W. TUCKWELL,

Author of "Reminiscences of Oxford."

TIMES.—"Whatever Mr. Tuckwell writes is bright, readable, and well informed, and when he writes about Oxford it is in a genial spirit . . . this collection of sketches is very welcome."

THE BISHOP OF NORWICH.

With Portraits and Illustrations. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

A BISHOP IN THE ROUGH.

Edited by the Rev. D. WALLACE DUTHIE,

Author of "The Case of Sir John Falstolf, and other Historical Studies."

With a Preface by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Norwich.

EAST ANGLIAN DAILY PRESS.—"An enchanting volume . . . This fascinating tale of travel and adventure . . . as a travel book or as an autobiography it has the rare distinction of holding the reader's attention until the last page is reached, and one regrets there is not another volume."

Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE WANDER YEARS.

Being some Account of Journeys into Life, Letters and Art.

By J. H. YOXALL, M.P.,

Author of "Chateau Royal," "Alain Tanger's Wife," etc.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THE IMMORTALS' GREAT QUEST.

By the Rev. J. W. BARLOW,

Ex-Vice-Provost of Trinity College, Dublin.

 A new edition of a philosophical romance which was published pseudonymously in Dublin some years ago, but almost immediately withdrawn from circulation: it is practically a new book.

With a Portrait Frontispiece from a Painting by J. S. SARGENT, R.A.

SIXTY YEARS IN THE WILDERNESS.

By HENRY W. LUCY ("TOBY, M.P." of Punch),

Author of "A Diary of Two Parliaments," "Mr. Gladstone: A Study from Life," "Peeps at Parliament," etc.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

 Mr. Lucy's pen loses none of its lively humour in depicting his ascent from the lowest rung of the journalistic and literary ladder to his present position. It is a very unusual story of hard work and knowledge of men and books. During the last 30 years Mr. Lucy has been brought into intimate relations with men eminent in politics, literature, art and the drama.

London:

SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The Rise and Progress of the South American Republics. By G. W. Crichfield. (Unwin. 25s. net.)
The South American Series. Edited by Martin Hume. Vol. 3. Mexico. By C. R. Enock. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
Turkey in Revolution. By C. Roden Buxton. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Papacy: The Idea and Its Exponents. By Gustav Krüger. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Dudley Book of Cookery and Household Recipes. By Georgiana, Countess of Dudley. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)
Modern Homes. By W. Raffles Davison. (Bell.)
Fish Stories. Alleged and Experienced. By Charles F. Holder and David S. Jordan. (Bell. 8s. net.)
Adventures in London. By James Douglas. (Cassell. 6s.)
Brighton: Its History, Its Follies, and Its Fashions. By Lewis Melville. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)
Piccadilly: Past and Present. By Arthur Irwin Dasent. (Chapman & Hall. 16s. net.)
English Heraldic Book Stamps: Figured and Described. By Cyril Davenport. (Constable. 25s. net.)
The Fallacy of Speed. An Essay. By T. F. Taylor. (Fifield. 1s. net.)
Nineteenth Century Teachers and Other Essays. By Julia Wedgwood. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)
Your Boy. His Nature and Nurture. By George A. Dickinson. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)
The Standard Concert Guide. By George P. Upton. (Hutchinson. 5s. net.)
Early Christian Hymns. By Daniel Joseph Donahoe. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)
Nights with the Gods. By Emil Reich. (Werner Laurie. 6s.)
The Coming Science. By Hereward Carrington. (Werner Laurie. 7s. 6d. net.)
Fights Forgotten. The History of Some of the Chief English and American Prize Fights. By Henry Sayers. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)
The Faith and Works of Christian Science. By the Author of "Confessio Medici." (Macmillan. 3s. 6d. net.)
The Meaning of Happiness, a Discourse. By Laurence Alma Tadema. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Territorial Force. By Harold Baker. Introduction by the Right Hon. R. B. Haldane. (Murray. 5s. net.)
The Frontiersman's Pocket Book. Compiled and Edited by Roger Pocock. (Murray. 5s. net.)
Hints on House Furnishing. By W. S. Sparrow. (Nash. 5s. net.)
The Edicts of Asoka. Edited by Vincent A. Smith. (Oxford University Press.)
Drugging a Nation. The Story of China and the Opium Curse. By Samuel Merwin. (Revell. 3s. 6d. net.)
Letters from a Working Man. By an American Mechanic (Charles Stelzle). (Revell. 3s. 6d. net.)
Methods of Mission Work Among Moslems. With an Introduction by E. M. Wherry. (Revell. 4s. net.)
The Family Doctor. By Edmund Barrett, M.B., B.Sc., M.R.C.S. (Routledge. 5s.)
St. Nicotine: A History of Tobacco. By A. V. Heward. (Routledge. 5s. net.)
Sailing Ships: The Story of Their Development from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By E. Keble Chatterton. (Sidgwick & Jackson. 16s. net.)
Modern Journalism: A Practical Guide for Beginners. By a London Editor. With Preface by G. R. Sims. (Sidgwick & Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Meaning of Money. By Hartley Withers. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
Leaves of the Lower Branch: The Attorney in Life and Letters. By E. B. V. Christian. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)
Opinions on Men, Women, and Things. By the late Harry Quilter. Articles collected and edited by Mrs. H. Quilter. (Sonnenschein.)
Book Prices Current, Index to Ten Volumes, 1897-1906. (Elliot Stock. £2 2s. net.)
The Panama Canal and Its Makers. By Vaughan Cornish. (Unwin. 5s.)
Mysterious Psychic Forces. By Camille Flammarion. (Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.)
The Place of Animals in Human Thought. By Countess Martinengo-Cesaresco. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
Town Planning in Practice. By Raymond Unwin. (Unwin. 21s. net.)
An Index of the Names of the Mahabharata. Translated by P. C. Roy. In 12 parts. Part 1-5. (Williams & Norgate. 7s. 6d. net each part.)

NEW EDITIONS AND REPRINTS.

Masters of Literature—
Scott. By Prof. Grant.
Fielding. By Prof. Saintsbury.
Defoe. By John Masefield.
Carlyle. By the Rev. A. W. Evans.
Thackeray. By G. K. Chesterton.
Hazlitt. By E. V. Lucas.
Dickens. By Thomas Seccombe.
De Quincey. By Sidney Low.
Emerson. By G. H. Perris.
Sterne. By Dr. Sidney Lee.
(Bell. 3s. 6d. net each.)
A History of the Latin and Teutonic Nations (1494-1514). By Leopold Von Ranke. Revised Translation by G. R. Dennis. (Bell. 6s. net.)
The Queen's Treasures Series—
Jan of the Windmill. By Mrs. Ewing. (Bell. 2s. 6d. net.)
Rugby Football. By Harry Vassall. Revised by C. J. B. Marriott. (Bell. 1s.)
Bohn's Libraries—
Homer's Iliad. New Prose Translation by E. M. Blakeney. Vol. I. (Bell. 5s.)
More's Utopia. Edited by George Sampson. (Bell.)
The Bruce. By John Barbour. Edited by W. M. Mackenzie. (Black, 5s. net.)
The Master of Game. By Edward, Second Duke of York. With Introduction by T. Roosevelt. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
Edgar Allan Poe's Choice Works: Poems, Stories, and Essays. With Introductory Essay by Charles Baudelaire. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)
The St. Martin's Library—
Essays of Travel. By Robert Louis Stevenson. (Chatto & Windus. 2s. net.)
The New Medieval Library—
IX. The Cell of Self-Knowledge. Edited by Edmund G. Gardner.
X., XI. Ancient English Christmas Carols, 1400-1700. Collected by Edith Rickert. (Chatto & Windus. 5s. net each.)
The King's Classics—
The Four Last Things. By Sir Thomas More. With A Spiritual Consolation. By John Fisher. (Chatto & Windus.)
Pearl. An English Poem of the Fourteenth Century. Edited by Prof. I. Gollancz. (Chatto & Windus. 1s. 6d. net each.)
The Shakespeare Library—
The Troublesome Reign of King John. Edited by F. J. Furnivall.
The History of Hamlet. Introduction by Prof. I. Gollancz.
The Play of King Leir and His Three Daughters. Edited by Sidney Lee.
(Chatto & Windus. 2s. 6d. net each.)
St. Martin's Illustrated Library of Standard Works—
The Works of Jane Austen: Pride and Prejudice; Sense and Sensibility; Northanger Abbey; Persuasion; Emma; Mansfield Park. With Notes by R. Brimley Johnson. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d. net per vol.)
Dramatis Personæ; and Dramatic Romances and Lyrics. By Robert Browning. Illustrations by Eleanor F. Brickdale. (Chatto & Windus. 6s. net.)

HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS.

CONQUERING THE ARCTIC ICE.

By EJNAR MIKKELSEN. Profusely Illustrated, demy 8vo, 20s. net.

"One of the most human and winning books of travel ever published,—a book that attracts us as much by its lively personality as by the breadth and intimacy of those powers of observation to which it bears witness."—Daily Telegraph.

RECOLLECTIONS OF

BARON DE FRÉNILLY, 1768-1828.

With Portrait, demy 8vo, 10s. net.

"He writes with all the Gallic vivacity and charm, while the dates show in what a stirring period he lived. There are many vivid events vividly described in this enthralling volume."
—Daily Chronicle.

AUTHORISED BY MR. WHISTLER.

THE LIFE OF

JAMES McNEILL WHISTLER.

By E. R. and J. PENNELL. Profusely Illustrated in Photogravure and Half-tone. 2 vols. cr. 4to, 36s. net.
[Third and Revised Edition.

"A masterly biography. It is rich in illustration of his personality as well as of his work."—Pall Mall Gazette.

COMPLETION OF A GREAT HISTORICAL WORK.

The Greatness and Decline of Rome

By GUGLIELMO FERRERO. 5 vols. demy 8vo, 6s. net each volume.

Vol. V.—EAST AND WEST. The Republic of Augustus.

 Historical students have immediately recognised the sound scholarship upon which this work is based, while it attracts the general reader by its charm and sustained interest, its picturesqueness, and its insight into character.

Romances of the French Revolution

By G. LENOTRE. Author of "Marie Antoinette." 2 vols. 20s. net.

"An admirable book. The author combines Professor Morse Stephens's zeal for burrowing in archives with Carlyle's delight in the human interest of his subject. All the stories are good."—Times.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

FRATERNITY.

By JOHN GALSWORTHY, Author of "The Man of Property" and "The Country House."

"There are many things in this book that are unforgetable; there are whole chapters that are masterpieces of delicate and restrained workmanship."—Standard.

RACHEL LORIAN. [2nd Imp.

By Mrs. HENRY DUDENEY, Author of "Folly Corner," &c.

UNCLE GREGORY.

By GEORGE SANDEMAN.

SYRINX. By LAURENCE NORTH.

"It is seldom indeed that one meets a book at once so virile and so excellent in manner and matter."—Sketch.

THE CLIMBER.

By E. F. BENSON. Author of "Sheaves," &c.

"The heroine may be likened to the immortal figure of Becky Sharp. It must be acknowledged that Mr. Benson's study is eminently successful."—Spectator.

A PRINCE OF DREAMERS.

By FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

"The book is fine; the intrigues are closely knotted; there is an abundance of vivid colour; and the narrative power grows effectively to the climax."—Saturday Review.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS'
NEW BOOKS & ANNOUNCEMENTS.

CHARACTERS AND EVENTS OF ROMAN HISTORY.
By GUGLIELMO FERRERO, Author of "The Greatness and Decline of Rome." Crown 8vo, cloth.

THE FLORENTINE PAINTERS OF THE RENAISSANCE.
With an Essay on their genius and a full list of their works in British and Continental Galleries. By BERNHARD BERENSON, Author of "The Venetian Painter of the Renaissance," etc. Third Edition and Enlarged. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net.

WHAT GREEKS HAVE DONE FOR MODERN CIVILISATION.
By Professor J. P. MAHAFFY. Crown 8vo, cloth.

SHELBURNE ESSAYS: Sixth Series.
By PAUL ELMER MORE. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net.

THE EMMANUEL MOVEMENT.
A systematic account of Experiments and Reflections Designed to Determine the Proper Relationship between the Minister and the Doctor in the Light of Modern Needs. By LYMAN P. POWELL, Author of "Christain Science," "The Art of Sleep,' etc. Crown 8vo, cloth.

MADAME, MOTHER OF THE REGENT.
By ARVEDE BARINE, Author of "La Grande Mademoiselle, etc. Fully illustrated. 8vo, cloth extra. 12s. 6d,

THE CENTURY OF THE CHILD.
By ELLEN KEY. Crown 8vo, cloth. 6s. net.

FIGHTING THE TURK IN THE BALKANS:
an American's Adventures with the Macedonian Revolutionists. By ARTHUR H. HOWDEN SMITH. Illustrated. Crown 8vo cloth extra, 6s.

THE NATURALISATION OF THE SUPERNATURAL.
By FRANK PODMORE, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth 7s. 6d. net.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SELF-HELP.
By STANTON DAVIS KIRKHAM. Crown 8vo, cloth extra. 5s.

BARTHOLOMEW DE LAS CASAS: His Life, His Apostolate, and His Writings.
By FRANCIS AUGUSTUS MacNUTT. Illustrated. 8vo, cloth 15s. net.

THE HEART OF A GEISHA.
By Mrs. HUGH FRASER. With a frontispiece in color by LUDWIG HOLBERG and ornamental borders and decorations by R. WEIR CROUCH. Cr. 8vo, cloth extra, and gilt edges, in box. 6s. net.

INVESTMENT BONDS.
A Book of Facts Relating to their Issue and Relationships in the Different Fields of Finance; the Issue of the Definitive Instrument, its Negotiation, etc.
By F. LOWNHAUPT. Crown 8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d.

THE RELIGION OF ISLAM.
By IGNAZ GOLDZIHER, PH.D., Professor of the University of Buda Pesth. Crown 8vo, cloth. 6s. Being the 8th Volume in the American Lectures on the History of Religions Series.

LIFE OF JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH.
By Sir C. H. HUBERT PARRY, Bt. Fully Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top. 12s. 6d. net.

POEMS OF EDGAR ALLAN POE.
With a Preface by Prof. C. RICHARDSON, and many fine Illustrations by Mr. F. S. COBURN. Small paper edition. Crown 8vo cloth extra, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

A New Edition Printed from New Plates.

THE WORKS OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT.
Dakota edition.
Illustrated. 16 vols. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. each.
List of Volumes:
THE NAVAL WAR OF 1812. 2 Vols. AMERICAN IDEALS, 2 Vols. ADDRESSES AND PRESIDENTIAL MESSAGES, 2 Vols. THE WINNING OF THE WEST, 6 Vols. THE WILDERNESS HUNTER, 2 Vols. HUNTING TRIPS OF A RANCHMAN, 2 Vols.

SEND FOR OUR NEW CATALOGUE.

24, BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C., AND NEW YORK.

The Dominion of Dreams. By Fiona Macleod. (Constable. 2s. 6d. net.)
A New History of Painting in Italy. By Crowe and Cavalcaselle. In 3 vols. Vol. II. (Dent. £3. net.)
Les Classiques Français Series—
Poèmes de Victor Hugo (1822-1865). (Dent. 1s. 6d. net.)
Memoirs of a Surrey Labourer. By George Bourne. (Duckworth. 2s. 6d. net.)
Life and Evolution. By F. W. Headley. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)
Laurel Crowned Letters. A New Series of the best letters of the best writers. (Heinemann.)
The Life of Frederick the Great. By Thomas Carlyle. Abridged and Edited by Edgar Sanderson. Introduction by Roger Ingpen. (Hutchinson. 5s. net.)
The Last Journals of Horace Walpole. Being His Memoirs of the Reign of George III, from 1771 to 1783. Edited with an Introduction by A. F. Stewart. 2 vols. (Lane. 21s. net.)
Elizabeth of Bohemia. By Mrs. Everett Green. Edited and revised by Mrs. S. C. Lomas. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By Edward Gibbon. Edited by J. B. Bury, M.A. In seven volumes. Vols. I. and II. (Methuen. Each 10s. 6d. net.)
Crowe and Cavalcaselle's History of Painting. By J. A. Crowe and G. B. Cavalcaselle. Edited by Langton Douglas. 6 vols. Vol. III. The Sienese, Umbrian, and North Italian Schools. (Murray. 21s. net.)
Hydrographical Surveying. By the late Rear-Admiral Sir W. J. L. Wharton. Revised and Enlarged by Rear-Admiral Mostyn Field. (Murray. 21s. net.)
The Story of the Tweed. By the Right Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell. (Nisbet. 6s. net.)
Poe's Poems and Critical Essays. Edited by R. Brimley Johnson. (Oxford University Press.)
Wilson's Arte of Rhetorique. Edited by G. H. Mair. (Oxford University Press.)
Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century. Vol. III., 1685-1700. Edited by J. E. Spingarn. (Oxford University Press.)
Hobbes' Leviathan. Edited by the late W. G. Pogson Smith. (Oxford University Press.)
Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry.
Gray's Poems. Edited by W. Bang.
Memoirs of Shelley. By Thomas Love Peacock. Edited by H. F. Brett Smith.
Shelley's Prose in the Bodleian. Edited by A. H. Koszul.
De Quincey's Literary Criticism. Edited by Helen Darbishire.
(Oxford University Press.)
Writings of American Statesmen. I. The Writings of George Washington. Edited by Laurence B. Evans. (Putnam. 10s. 6d. net.)
The Hand of God. By the late Grant Allen. (Rationalist Press Association.)
Life of Haeckel. By Prof. W. Bölsche. (Rationalist Press Association.)
Paganism and Christianity. By J. A. Farrer. (Rationalist Press Association.)
Life of Paine. By the late Dr. Moncure D. Conway. (Rationalist Press Association.)
British Birds in Their Haunts. By the late Rev. C. A. Johns. Edited by J. A. Owen. (Routledge. 7s. 6d. net.)
William Chapman: Complete Dramatic Works. Edited by T. F. Parrott. 2 vols. (Routledge. 6s. each.)
Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding. (Routledge. 2s. 6d.)
Novels of Lord Lytton. 12 vols. Edinburgh Edition. (Routledge. In sets only. £4 10s. net.)
Complete Works in Verse and Prose of Sir John Suckling. Edited by A. H. Thompson. (Routledge.)
The Pocket-Book Series.
1. The Pocket-Book of Famous Poems.
2. The Pocket-Book of Selections from Dickens.
3. The Pocket-Book of Essays on Walking. Introduction by Hilaire Belloc.
(Sidgwick & Jackson. Cloth. 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net each.)
The Complete English Works of Thomas Campion. Edited by A. H. Bullen. (Sidgwick & Jackson. Cloth. 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.)
Hours in a Library. By Leslie Stephen. In 3 vols. (Smith, Elder. 3s. 6d. net each.)
Skeptics of the Italian Renaissance. By the Rev. J. Owen. (Sonnenschein.)
Feudal England. (XIth. and XIIth. Centuries.) By J. Horace Round. (Sonnenschein.)
The Economic Interpretation of History. By Prof. J. E. T. Rogers. (Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)
Aristotle's Theory of Conduct. By Thomas Marshall. (Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.)
Life and Matter. By Sir Oliver Lodge. (Williams & Norgate. 6s. net.)

PHILOSOPHY.

A Text-Book of Experimental Psychology. By Charles S. Myers. (Arnold. 8s. 6d. net.)
Ethics. By John Dewey and James H. Tufts. (Bell. 8s. 6d. net.)
God With Us. A Study in Religious Idealism. By W. R. Boyce Gibson. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)
Studies in European Philosophy. By James Lindsay. (Blackwood. 10s. 6d. net.)
Mind and Work. By Luther H. Gulick. (Cassell. 3s. 6d. net.)
Philosophies: Ancient and Modern.
Stoicism. By Prof. St. George Stock.
Plato. By Prof. A. E. Taylor.
Hobbes. By Prof. A. E. Taylor.
Schopenhauer. By T. W. Whittaker.
Bergson. By Father Tyrrell.
Lucretius and the Atomists. By Edward Clodd.
(Constable. 1s. net each.)
St. Thomas Aquinas. By H. C. O'Neill. (Dent. 3s. 6d. net.)
On the Tracks of Life. The Immorality of Morality. Translated from the Italian of Leo. G. Sera by J. M. Kennedy. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Greek Thinkers. By Theodor Gomperz. 4 vols.
Vol. IV. Aristotle and His Successors. Translated by G. G. Berry.
(Murray. 14s. net.)
The Riddle of Personality. By H. Addington Bruce. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)
Library of Philosophy. A Translation of Hegel's Phenomenology of Mind. By J. B. Baillie. (Sonnenschein.)
Thought and Things: A Study of the Development and Meaning of Thought or Genetic Logic. By James M. Baldwin. 3 vols. Vol. III. Real Logic. (Sonnenschein.)
Les Données immediates de la Conscience. By Prof. Bergson. Translated by F. L. Pogson. (Sonnenschein.)
The History of Philosophy. Based on the Work of Dr. J. E. Erdmann. By W. S. Hough. (Sonnenschein.)
Valuation: Its Nature and Laws. By Prof. Urban.
(Sonnenschein.)
Physiological Psychology. By W. Wundt. Translated by Prof. E. B. Titchener. 3 vols. Vol. II.
(Sonnenschein.)
Source Book in Ancient Philosophy. By C. M. Bakewell. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)
Psychological Text-Books. By C. H. Judd.
1. Psychology—General Introduction. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)
2. Laboratory Manual of Psychology. (Unwin. 4s. net.)
3. Laboratory Equipments for Psychological Experiments. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

POETRY.

London's Lure. An Anthology. By Helen and Lewis Melville. (Bell. 3s. 6d. net.)
Poems. By Dorothea Hollins. (Brown, Langham. 2s. 6d. net.)

BOOKS FOR YOUR LIBRARY LIST

Indispensable to Every Bibliophile

INDEX TO THE SECOND TEN VOLUMES OF BOOK-PRICES CURRENT, 1897 to 1906.

Demy 8vo, pp. xx-1058, buckram gilt. Price $2 2s. net.

¶ The value of the work to Collectors, Librarians and Bookseller, is incalculable, as it affords an index to the whole range of the world's best literature, and furnishes reliable information as to the correct value of standard and rare works in every department.

Biography.

AN OXFORD TUTOR. By C. E. H. EDWARDS. The Life of the Rev. THOMAS SHORT, B.D., of Trinity College, Oxford. Foolscap 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d. net (by post, 1s. 8d.)

THE LIFE OF ROGER LANGDON Told by Himself. With additions by his daughter, ELLEN. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net (by vost 2s. 9d.).

A VARIED LIFE, by Sea & Land. 1856 to 1891. Incidents and Adventures. By JOHN MACDONALD LANE. Crown 8vo, paper covers, 6d.

Religious.

LIGHT FOR LESSER DAYS. By the Rev. CANON TUCKER. With Meditations on the Black-Letter Saints of the Prayer-book. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net (by post 6s. 4d.).

LIGHT ON THE ADVENT. By By THOMAS NAYLER. With several Original Illustra, tions of the Ancient Temple of Jerusalem. Demy 8vo-cloth gilt, 5s. net (by post 5s. 4d.).

THE MYSTERY OF SEVEN. A Study of Silent Analogies in Scripture. By E. M. SMITH, Author of "The Zodia" and "Mystery of Three." Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Fiction.

THE STRONGER WINGS. By A. JEANS. A Story dealing with Austria during Metternich's time. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

AGNÈS. A Romance of the Siege of Paris. Translated from the French of JULES CLARETIE by ADA SOLLY FLOOD. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Poetry.

THOUGHTS IN SOLITUDE. The Story of the Bramble and other Poems. By GRAHAM BURR. Crown 8vo, leather gilt, 4s. 6d. net by post 4s. 9d.).

THE DUKE OF ENGHIEN, and other Poems. By F. S. HOLLINGS. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

"Mr. Hollings has too much originality of thought to be classed among the minor poets."—Bath Chronicle.

THE CLOUD WORLD. Its Features and Significance. Being a Popular Account of Forms and Phenomena. With a Glossary. By SAMUEL BARBER. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

Write for list of Antiquarian and General Literature free by post.

LONDON:

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

THE NEW FIFTY "EVERYMAN"

CLOTH 1/- NET. LEATHER 2/- NET.

341	CLEIG'S LIFE OF WELLINGTON
342-3	LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB. 2 Vols
344	ARISTOPHANES. FRERE'S TRANSLATION
345	CICERO'S SELECT LETTERS AND ORATIONS
346	CRAIK'S MANUAL OF ENGLISH LITERATURE
347	SWIFT'S TALE OF A TUB, ETC.
348	GILFILLAN'S LITERARY PORTRAITS
349	BALZAC'S CAT AND RACKET, ETC.
350	BLACKMORE'S SPRINCHAVEN
351	BRONTE'S VILETTE
352	BURNEY'S EVELINA
353	GEORGE ELIOT'S FELIX HOLT
354	ERCKMANN-CHATRIAN'S THE CONSCRIPT AND WATERLOO
355-6	FIELDING'S TOM JONES. 2 Vols.
357	RICHELIEU. BY G P. R. JAMES
358	MARRYAT'S PERCIVAL KEENE
359	THACKERAY'S XMAS BOOKS
360	TROLLOPE'S DR. THORNE
361	,, SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON
362	YONGE'S HEIR OF REDCLYFFE
363-4	HUGO'S LES MISERABLES. 2 Vols.
365-6	ANNALS OF FAIRYLAND. 2 vols.
367	JULES VERNE'S DROPPED FROM THE CLOUDS
368	JULES VERNE'S ABANDONED
369	JULES VERNE'S SECRET OF THE ISLAND
370	MARRYAT'S SETTLERS IN CANADA
371	UNCLE TOM'S CABIN
372-4	FROUDE'S HENRY VIII. 3 Vols.
375	,, EDWARD VI.
376	MACHIAVELLI'S HISTORY OF FLORENCE
377-8	MILMAN'S HISTORY OF THE JEWS
379	SWEDENBORG'S HEAVEN AND HELL
380	THE KORAN. RODWELL'S TRANSLATION
381	EVERYMAN AND OTHER MIRACLE PLAYS
382	LONGFELLOW'S POEMS
383	MARLOWE'S PLAYS AND POEMS
384	MILTON'S POEMS
385-6	DON QUIXOTE. MOTTEUX'S TRANS. 2 Vols.
387	BOSWELL'S TOUR IN THE HEBRIDES
388 9	HAKLUYT'S VOYAGES VOLS. VII. AND VIII., COMPLETING WORK
390	LYTTON'S PILGRIMS OF THE RHINE

PLEASE USE NUMBERS WHEN ORDERING.

READY MARCH 9th

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

OR DIRECT FROM

J. M. DENT & CO.,

19, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

Complete Lists of the Volumes already Published can be had on application.

A Treasury of South African Poetry and Verse. Selected by E. T. Crouch. (Fifield. Cloth, 3s. 6d.)
New Poems. By Richard Le Gallienne. (Lane. 4s. 6d. net.)
Odds and Ends: Miscellaneous Verses. By R. Montague Tabor. (Longmans, Green.)
Dante's Inferno, Purgatorio, and Paradiso. Translated into English Verse by Edward Wilberforce. 3 vols. (Macmillan.)
The Poems and Sonnets of Louise Chandler Moulton. With Introduction by Harriet Prescott Spofford. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d.)
Artemision: Idylls and Songs. By Maurice Hewlett. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)
A Knight's Heart, and Other Verses. By Joseph Thorp. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
Personæ. By Ezra Pound. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
Transcripts from Heine. By the Rev. George Tyrrell. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
A Few Lyrics. By Laurence Alma Tadema. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
River Music and Other Poems. By W. R. Titterton. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)
Vanderdecken and Other Pieces. By Gilbert Hudson. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)
The Mountainy Singer. Poems by Seosamh MacCathmhoil. Illustrated by Seaghan MacCathmhoil. (Maunsel.)
Insurrections. Poems by James Stephens. (Maunsel.)
The Power of Red Michael, and Other Ballads. By Canon Langbridge. (Maunsel.)
Wisdom of the East Series—
The Confessions of Al Ghazzali. Translated for the first time into English by Claud Field.
A Lute of Jade. By L. Cranmer-Byng.
(Murray. 1s. net each.)
The Englishman in Italy: An Anthology. Edited by G. H. Wollaston. (Oxford University Press.)
Each in His Own Tongue, and Other Poems. By William H. Carruth. (Putnam. 3s. 6d. net.)
Breath of the World: Poems. By Starr Hoyt Nichols. Putnam. 6s. net.)
Poems by the late Rev. Dr. Richard Watson Dixon. A Selection. By Robert Bridges. (Smith, Elder. 4s. 6d. net.)

SCIENCE.

The Dressing of Minerals. By Henry Louis. (Arnold. 30s. net.)
The Body at Work. By Dr. Alex. Hill. (Arnold. 16s. net.)
The Geology of Ore Deposits. By H. H. Thomas and D. A. MacAlister, of the Geological Survey. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)
On the Calculation of Thermo-Chemical Constants. By H. Stanley Redgrove. (Arnold. 6s. net.)
The Development of the Chick. By Frank R. Lillie. (Bell. 16s. net.)
A Treatise on Zoology. Edited by Sir E. Ray Lankester. Part I. First Fascicle: Introduction and Protozoa. By Prof. S. J. Hickson, F. W. Gamble, J. J. Lister, A. Willey, H. M. Woodcock, and the late Prof. Weldon.
Part VII. First Fascicle: Crustacea. By W. T. Calman. (Cloth, 15s. net each; paper covers, 12s. 6d. net each.)
Part IX. First Fascicle: Vertebrata Craniata. By E. S. Goodrich. (Black.)
Chemical Analysis, Qualitative and Quantitative. By George G. Gardiner. Vol. I. (Black.)
Practical Physics. By Angus McLean. Vol. I. (Black.)
Studies on Immunisation and Their Application to the Diagnosis and Treatment of Bacterial Infections. By Sir A. E. Wright. (Constable. 16s. net.)
Heavy Electrical Engineering. By H. M. Hobart. (Constable. 16s. net.)
Compressed Air: Its Production, Uses, and Applications. By Gardner D. Hiscox. (Constable. 20s. net.)
Introduction to the Chemistry and Physics of Building Materials. By Alan E. Munby. (Constable. 6s. net.)
Radium and Geology. By Professor John Joly. (Constable.)
Aerial Warfare. By R. P. Hearne. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Making of Species. By Douglas Dewar, F.C.S., F.Z.S., and Frank Finn, F.Z.S., M.B.O.U. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Philosophy of Long Life. By Jean Finot. A Translation by Harry Roberts. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
Everyday Electricity. By Frank Broadbent, M.I.E.E. (Werner Laurie. 3s. 6d. net.)
Spinning Tops and Gyroscopic Motion. By Harold Crabtree. (Longmans, Green.)
Analysis of the Evolution of Musical Form. By Margaret H. Glyn. (Longmans, Green.)
The Natural History of Igneous Rocks. By Alfred Harker, F.R.S. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
Drugs and the Drug Habit: Chapters on the Dynamics of a Remedial Particle. By Harrington Sainsbury, M.D. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Young Naturalist. By W. Percival Westell, F.L.S. (Methuen. 6s.)
The Progressive Science Series—
The Interpretation of Radium. By Frederick Soddy. (Murray.)
Injuries and Diseases of the Knee-Joint. Considered from the Clinical Aspect. By Sir William H. Bennett, F.R.C.S. (Nisbet. 5s. net.)
Experimental Embryology. By J. W. Jenkinson. (Oxford University Press.)
Elementary Biology. By J. W. Kirkaldy and I. N. Drummond. (Oxford University Press.)
The History of Science Series:
The History of Astronomy. By Prof. George Forbes.
The History of Chemistry. By Dr. Thomas E. Thorpe.
The History of Geology. By H. B. Woodward.
The History of Geography. By Dr. Scott Keltie.
The History of Anthropology. By Prof. A. C. Haddon.
(Rationalist Press Association.)
How Telegraphs and Telephones Work. Explained in non-technical language. By Charles R. Gibson. (Seeley. 1s. 6d. net.)
A Text-Book of Petrology. By Frederick H. Hatch. (Sonnenschein.)
The Student's Text-Book of Zoology. By A. Sedgwick. In 3 vols. Vol. III. (Sonnenschein.)
Plant Life: A Manual of Botany for Schools. By Prof. E. Warming. Translated by M. Rehling and E. M. Thomas. (Sonnenschein.)
How to Study the Stars. By L. Rudaux. Translated by A. H. Keane. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
The Mineral Kingdom. By Dr. Reinhard Brauns. Translated by L. J. Spencer. In 25 parts. Parts 1-3. (Williams & Norgate. 2s. net each part.)

SOCIOLOGY AND POLITICS.

Letters from a Settlement. By Miss A. L. Hodson. (Arnold. 4s. 6d. net.)
An Englishman's Castle. By Miss M. Loane. (Arnold. 6s.)
A History of Medieval Political Theory in the West. Vol. II. By R. W. Carlyle and A. J. Carlyle. (Blackwood. 15s. net.)
Parenthood and Race-Culture. An Outline of Eugenics. By C. W. Saleeby. (Cassell. 7s. 6d. net.)
Racial Problems in Hungary. By "Scotus Viator" (R. W. Seton-Watson). (Constable. 16s. net.)
Economic Heresies: Being an Unorthodox Attempt to appreciate the Economic Problems presented by "Things as They Are." By Sir Nathaniel Nathan. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
Russia's Message: The True World-Import of the Revolution. By W. English Walling. (Fifield. 12s. 6d. net.)
Natural Monopolies, in Relation to Social Democracy. (A reply to Mr. W. H. Mallock.) By Charles Derwent Smith. (Fifield. 2s. 6d. net.)
"No Votes for Women," A reply to Anti-Suffrage Arguments. By Lady Constance Lytton. (Fifield. 3d. net.)
Socialism and National Minimum. By Mrs. Sidney Webb, Miss B. L. Hutchins, and The Fabian Society. (Fabian Socialist Series.) (Fifield.)
Wastage of Child Life. By Dr. J. Johnston. (Fabian Socialist Series.) (Fifield.)

THE CHURCH AND LABOUR.

CHARLES STELZLE'S

Visit to England.

Mr. Charles Stelzle is the Superintendent of the "Department of Church and Labour," Presbyterian Church of United States of America.

LATEST BOOKS BY CHARLES STELZLE.

Letters from a Working Man.

3s. 6d. net. Postage 4d.

With compelling logic Mr. Stelzle tells us in this series of LETTERS FROM A WORKING MAN what the working man, when he is with his fellows, thinks and says about his employers, about the trade unions, about shop conditions, about philanthropy and slumming, about the public-house, and about the Church. About what he likes and what he hates. In a word, he exhausts a subject of the widest interest—the Labour problem of to-day.

The Working Man and Social Problems.

2s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

"Everyone who is interested in the working man and social problems will enjoy reading this book."

Messages to Working Men.

1s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

"Deals with questions met with in labour halls and in personal conversation with men interested in the relation of the Church to the labour movement."

Christianity's Storm Centre.

A STUDY OF THE MODERN CITY.

3s. 6d. net. Postage 4d.

"Clergymen who would understand the conditions that challenge or invite them to this field should not neglect this report. It will disabuse the fair-minded of current misunderstandings and prejudices, and open the way to efforts commensurate with their professed desires."

Boys of the Street.

HOW TO WIN THEM.

1s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

"He writes wisely and practicably, and his book deserves to be read, and his method is deserving of imitation."

FLEMING H. REVELL Co., 21, Paternoster-sq., E.C., & Edinburgh

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS.

SAILING SHIPS

THE STORY OF THEIR DEVELOPMENT FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE PRESENT DAY.

By E. KEBLE CHATTERTON.

With over 100 illustrations from photographs and drawings. Extra Royal 8vo, 320 pages, designed cover in cloth gilt, 16s. net.

A Popular History of ships, very fully illustrated, from Egyptian and Phœnician vessels to modern yachts.

LAND VALUES TAXATION: THE ESSENTIAL REFORM

By C. H. CHOMLEY AND R. L. OUTHWAITE

Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net.; wrappers, 1s. net.

A Handbook to an important question of the day written by Experts.

THREE PLAYS BY GRANVILLE BARKER

THE MARRYING OF ANNE LEETE
THE VOYSEY INHERITANCE
WASTE

In one Volume 5s. net.: Separate Plays, in cloth, 2s. net.; in paper wrappers, 1s. 6d. net.

THE POCKET-BOOK SERIES

1. Famous Poems
2. Selections from Dickens
3. Essays on Walking: with an introduction by Hilaire Belloc.

F'cap. 8vo, 232 pages, cloth 1s. 6d. net; leather 2s. 6d. net.

THE BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE

and other Poems by the Rev. Chas. Wolfe, with a Collotype Fac-simile of the Original Manuscript of "THE BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE." With an Introductory Memoir by C. Litton Falkiner. 1s. net.

COMPLETE ENGLISH WORKS OF

THOMAS CAMPION

Edited by A. H. Bullen. F'cap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net., leather 3s. 6d. net. A pocket edition of the Poems and Masques, reprinted from Mr. Bullen's edition princeps.

LETTERS OF JAMES BOSWELL to the Rev. W. J. Temple. With an introduction by THOMAS SECCOMBE, and three portraits. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A welcome reprint of a rare book that reveals Boswell no less admirably than the more famous work."—Daily Telegraph.

3, ADAM STREET, ADELPHI.

SIDGWICK & JACKSON Ltd., LONDON, W.C.

The LIFE, LETTERS & WORKS of RUSKIN

VOLUMES 6 and 37 JUST OUT.

The Letters of Ruskin

In addition to numerous unpublished letters to his father and mother, these volumes include letters of Ruskin to:—

Sir Henry Acland, Lord Avebury, Miss Beever, Dr. John Brown, Rawdon Brown, the Brownings, Burne-Jones, Carlyle, Froude, Mrs. Gaskell, Mary Gladstone (Mrs. Drew), Kate Greenaway, Holman Hunt, Mrs. La Touche, Lord Leighton, H.R.H. Prince Leopold, Dean Liddell, Sir Oliver Lodge, Cardinal Manning, Stacy Marks, Mary Russell Mitford, Wm. Morris, Lord and Lady Mount-Temple, F. W. H. Myers, Charles Eliot Norton, F. J. Palgrave, Coventry Patmore, George Richmond, Samuel Rogers, Dante Rossetti, Mrs. Arthur Severn, Sir John and Lady Simon, Spurgeon, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Tennyson, Thackeray, Lady Lousia Waterford, G. F. Watts, and many other correspondents.

Vol. xxxvi. contains 720 pages, 25 plates, and 4 facsimiles of MSS.
,, xxxvii. ,, 756 ,, 12 ,, 11 ,, ,,

The FINAL volume, consisting of a Complete Bibliography, a Catalogue of Ruskin Drawings, and an INDEX to the WHOLE WORK, will necessarily take many months to prepare, and as the INDEX is calculated to contain over

100,000 REFERENCES

no definite date can yet be fixed for the publication of this volume.

THE LIFE, LETTERS AND WORKS OF RUSKIN

Edited by E. T. COOK and ALEXANDER WEDDERBURN.

Contain about 1,800 Illustrations, including all RUSKIN'S PUBLISHED DRAWINGS and many that have HITHERTO REMAINED UNPUBLISHED.

For full particulars of this MONUMENTAL EDITION in 38 Volumes, at 25s. each or at £42, or the set; or in monthly instalments, see Prospectus.

PAYMENT CAN BE ARRANGED SO AS TO PLACE THE WORK WITHIN THE REACH OF ALL.

London: GEORGE ALLEN & SONS, 156, Charing Cross Road.

The Political Future of India. A Study of the Aspirations of Educated Indians. By H. P. Mody (Bombay). (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d. net.)
Unemployment: A Problem of Industry. By W. H. Beveridge. (Longmans, Green. 7s. 6d. net.)
Human Economics. Books I. and II. By A. H. Gibson. (Longmans, Green.)
Totemism and Exogamy. A Treatise on Certain Ancient Forms of Superstition and Society. By Prof. J. G. Frazer. 3 vols. (Macmillan.)
Australian Socialism. By A. St. Ledger. (Macmillan.)
The Struggle for Imperial Unity. By Colonel G. T. Denison. (Macmillan.)
Utopian Papers. Being Addresses to "The Utopians." Edited by Dorothea Hollins. (Masters. 3s. 6d. net.)
Austro-Hungarian Affairs. By Geoffrey Drage. (Murray.)
The South African Natives: Their Present Condition and Progress. Edited by the South African Native Races Committee. (Murray. 6s. net.)
Hungary of To-day. Edited by Percy Alden. (Nash.)
Nonconformity and Politics. By A Nonconformist Minister. (Pitman. 3s. 6d. net.)
The Government of American Cities. By Horace E. Deming. (Putnam.)
Some Southern Questions. By William A. MacCorkle. (Putnam. 6s. net.)
The Menace of Socialism. By W. Lawler Wilson. (Grant Richards. 6s. net.)
Labour and Housing at Port Sunlight. By W. L. George. (Alston Rivers. 3s. 6d. net.)
Land-Values and Their Meaning. By C. H. Chomley and R. L. Outhwaite. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)
The English Woman: Studies in Her Psychic Evolution. By David Staars. Translated and Abridged by J. M. E. Brownlow. (Smith, Elder. 9s. net.)
Military Needs and Military Policy. By the Rt. Hon. H. O. Arnold-Forster. With a Preface by Field-Marshal Earl Roberts. (Smith, Elder. 3s. 6d. net.)
Bushman Folk-Lore. By Miss L. C. Lloyd. Edited by Dr. G. M. Theal. (Sonnenschein.)
Modern Constitutions. By Walter Fairleigh Dodd. (Unwin. 21s. 6d. net.)
Industrial Insurance. By C. Richmond Henderson. (Unwin. 9s. net.)
Towards Social Reform. By Canon and Mrs. Barnett. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
Psychology and Crime. By Hugo Münsterberg. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

THEOLOGY.

Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology. By Dr. Solomon Schechter. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Old Testament in the Light of the Religion of Babylonia and Assyria. By J. Evans Thomas. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)
Essays on the Bible. By the Rev. A. W. Momerie. (Blackwood. 3s. 6d. net.)
Faith: The Word and the Thing. By the Right Rev. Handley C. G. Moule, Bishop of Durham. (Cassell. 3s. 6d.)
The First Things of Jesus. By the Rev. John Reid. (James Clarke. 3s. 6d. net.)
The Art of Sermon Illustration. By H. Jeffs. (James Clarke. 3s. 6d. net.)
Hastings' One Volume Bible Dictionary. (T. & T. Clark.)
The Christian Doctrine of God. By Prof. W. N. Clarke. (T. & T. Clark.)
Biblical Criticism and Modern Thought. By Prof. W. G. Jordan. (T. & T. Clark.)
The Literature of the New Testament Series:—
The Pauline Epistles. By Robert Scott. (T. & T. Clark.)
An Introduction to the New Testament. In 3 vols. By Prof. T. Zahn. Translated by Prof. M. W. Jacobus. (T. & T. Clark.)
Outlines of Introduction to the Hebrew Bible. By Prof. A. S. Geden. (T. & T. Clark.)
The Tests of Life. (The Kerr Lectures.) By the Rev. Robert Law. (T. & T. Clark.)
The Background of the Gospels. (The Cunningham Lectures.) By the Rev. W. Fairweather. (T. & T. Clark.)
Studies in Theology:—
Revelation and Inspiration. By the Rev. James Orr.
Philosophy and Religion. By Dr. Hastings Rashdall.
Faith and Its Psychology. By the Rev. William R. Inge. (Duckworth. 3s. net each vol.)
God the Known and God the Unknown. By Samuel Butler. (Fifield. 1s. 6d. net.)
Orpheus. By Dr. Solomon Reinach. (Heinemann.)
Studies in Religion and Theology. By the Rev. Principal A. M. Fairbairn. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
Fellowship in the Life Eternal. An Exposition of the Epistles of St. John. By the Rev. Professor G. G. Findlay. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d.)
Mansfield College Essays. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)
The Expositor's Greek Testament. Edited by the Rev. W. Robertson Nicoll. Complete in 4 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton. £3 net the set of 4 vols., 28s. each vol.)
Expositions of Holy Scripture. By the Rev. A. Maclaren. (Hodder & Stoughton. First 4 series of 6 vols. each. 24s. net each, 7s. 6d. per vol.)
The Analysed Bible. By the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan. New vols. The Gospel of St. John; The Book of Job. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d. each.)
The Missionary Manifesto. Being a Study in the Great Commissions. By the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. net.)
The Priesthood of the Laity. By the Rev. Canon Ryder. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
The Historical Bible. By Prof. Charles F. Kent. In 6 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s. net each.)
The Psychological Phenomena of Christianity. By George B. Cutten. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)
The Century Bible Handbooks—
Christian Ethics. By the Rev. Prof. R. Mackintosh.
The New Testament Doctrine of Christ. By the Rev. Principal Adeney.
St. Paul. By the Rev. Principal A. E. Garvie. (Jack.)
The Dawn of the Catholic Revival in England, 1781-1803. By Bernard Ward. (Longmans, Green.)
The Spirit of Christ in Common Life. Addresses and Sermons. By Charles Bigg. (Longmans, Green. 6s. net.)
Anselm's Theory of the Atonement: The Bohlen Lectures. By the Rev. George C. Foley. (Longmans, Green.)
A History of the Doctrine of The Holy Eucharist. By Darwell Stone. (Longmans, Green.)
Christianity and the Supernatural. By the Right. Rev. C. F. D'Arcy. (Longmans, Green. 1s. net.)
Social Work. By the Rev. W. E. Chadwick. (Longmans, Green, 1s. net.)
Pastoral Work. By the Rev. R. C. Joynt. (Longmans, Green. 1s. net.)
The Oxford Library. Immortality. By the Rev. E. E. Holmes. (Longmans, Green. 5s.)
St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians. English Translation. By J. Armitage Robinson. (Macmillan.)
Life After Death. By the Rev. S. C. Gayford. (Masters. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Purpose of Life. From the Sermons of Padre Agostino da Montefeltro. Translated by Catherine M. Phillimore. 2 vols. (Masters. 4s. net.)
The Threshold of Religion. By R. R. Marett. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.)
The Creed in the Epistles. By the Rev. Wilfrid Richmond. (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net.)
Anni Domini: A Gospel Study. By Lady Mabel Lindsay. In 2 vols. (Methuen. 10s. net.)
A Plain Guide to the Communion Office. By the Ven. G. Arbuthnot. (Mowbray. 1d.)
Counsels and Precepts. With Introduction by the Rev. G. Body. Translated by Mgr. Charles Gay. (Mowbray. 3s. 6d. net.)
On Prophecy. Sermons preached by the Very Rev. Henry Wace, Dean of Canterbury. (Murray.)
Papal Infallibility and its Roman Catholic Opponents. By the Rev. W. J. S. Simpson. (Murray.)

MR. JOHN LANE'S SPRING BOOKS

THE JOURNAL OF JOHN MAYNE

During a Tour on the Continent upon its Re-opening after the Fall of Napoleon, 1714.

Edited by his Grandson, JOHN MAYNE COLLES. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"The book is interesting not only for what it contains of descriptions and impressions, but also as the expression of one who may be regarded as a typical well-educated Englishman of his time."—Daily Telegraph.

UNDER PETRAIA, WITH SOME SAUNTERINGS.

By the Author of "In a Tuscan Garden." With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"Purely conversational in style as this book is, it possesses that indefinable literary charm which holds fast the reader who has once opened its pages, so that he cannot put it down till he has reached the end. Even then it will be taken up again and again, to be dipped into here and there as the fancy seizes us."—Globe.

IN Re SHAKESPEARE:

BEECHING v. GREENWOOD, Rejoinder on behalf of the Defendant. By G. G. GREENWOOD. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

BRITISH MALAYA.

An Account of the Origin and Progress of British influence in Malaya. By Sir F. A. SWETTENHAM. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo. New Edition. 7s. 6d. net.

LADIES FAIR AND FRAIL.

Sketches of the Demi-Monde during the Eighteenth Century.

By HORACE BLEACKLEY, Author of "The Story of a Beautiful Duchess." With numerous Portraits reproduced from contemporary sources. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE WOMAN IN THE CAR.

A Guide for Women Motorists. By DOROTHY LEVITT. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

ON THE TRACKS OF LIFE.

The Immorality of Morality. Translated from the Italian of LEO G. SERA, by J. M. KENNEDY, with an Introduction by Dr. OSCAR LEVY. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Dr. Sera is a physician who has deeply studied literature and historical science, and the object of his book is, in the opening words of the preface, "to establish our conception of social life on its original basis." He holds that the diffusion of democratic principles is vulgarising science and art, and that present social conditions, especially work and Christian teaching, are leading to the intellectual and moral degeneration of the race.

A SISTER OF PRINCE RUPERT:

Elizabeth Princess Palatine, Abbess of Herford.

By ELIZABETH GODFREY, Author of "Heidelberg: Its Princes and its Palaces," "English Children in the Olden Times," &c. With numerous Illustrations reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints, &c. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"No historical biography published during the last few years surpasses this one in the minuteness of its research and the width of the field it has covered."—Morning Post.

MADRID,

An Historical and Descriptive Account of the Spanish Capital.

With 450 Illustrations. By A. F. CALVERT. (The Spanish Series.) 3s. 6d. net.

EL GRECO.

A Biography and an Appreciation. Illustrated by over 140 reproductions and Photographs from his Pictures. By A. F. CALVERT. (The Spanish Series.) 3s. 6d. net.

THE LATEST NOVELS

"Pereunt et imputantur. . . . The oysters are eaten, and put down in the bill; but you observe, Lady Mickleham, it doesn't say whose bill."

SOMEONE PAYS,

BY A NEW WRITER.

SOMEONE PAYS,

A STRIKING NOVEL BY NOEL BARWELL.

A novel written in the form of letters. Critics are apt unconsciously to demand a higher standard of fiction which assumes this unusual form. One calls to mind such former efforts as "Evelina" and Swinburne's "Love's Cross-Currents."

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH.

By ALICE HERBERT.

"It constitutes a piece of psychology of which the author may well be proud; absorbing in interest; lightened, too, by abundant humour, and dialogue that is brilliant, but not unnaturally so."—Academy.

"Reveals an unusual clearness of vision and distinction of thought and style. . . . Miss Herbert has both sympathy and imagination."—Morning Post.

THE PRINCE'S PRANKS.

By CHARLES LOWE.

BALTHASAR.

By ANATOLE FRANCE.

"Delightful expressions of vision, thought, and knowledge, seemingly so slight, yet so compact, and told with an almost scientific precision. . . . Mrs. John Lane has done the translation with insight and affection."

—Daily Chronicle.

LITTLE DINNERS WITH THE SPHINX.

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

"Ten little stories of the rarest, most delicate charm. Fantastic, of course; sentimental, sometimes tragic, with a kindly elf of humour smiling behind it all."—Observer.

CHIP: A Novel.

By F. E. MILLS YOUNG, Author of "A Mistaken Marriage."

This is a story of the veld, of the lives of a small community of Europeans dwelling far from civilisation amid the silence and solitude of the swamps of East Africa.

THE DOOMSWOMAN.

By GERTRUDE ATHERTON. A New Edition.

"A fine drama, finely conceived and finely executed."

Morning Post

ON SALE EVERYWHERE. SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON & NEW YORK.

St. John: Apostle, Evangelist, and Prophet. By the Rev. C. E. Scott-Moncrieff. (Nisbet. 4s. 6d. net.)
The Claim of God on Art, Commerce, and Industry. By John Kelman. (Oliphant, Anderson. 1s. net.)
The Origins of Christianity. By the late Charles Bigg. Edited by T. B. Strong. (Oxford University Press.)
The Sikh Religion: its Gurus, Sacred Writings, and Authors. 6 vols. By M. A. Macauliffe. (Oxford University Press.)
The Samaritans. The Earliest Jewish Sect: Their History, Theology, and Literature. By James A. Montgomery. (Paul. 10s. 6d. net.)
Body and Soul. By Percy Dearmer. (Pitman. 6s. net.)
The Foundation and the Superstructure; or, the Faith of Christ and the Works of Man. By Richard M. de Mill. (Putnam. 12s. 6d. net.)
Passiontide and Easter. By the Rev. V. R. Lennard. (Skeffington. 2s. net.)
Short Addresses for Holy Week. By the Rev. W. V. Mason. (Skeffington. 1s. 6d. net.)
Isms. By the Rev. Basil G. Bouchier. (Skeffington. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Signs and Symbols of Primordial Man. By Dr. A. Churchward. (Sonnenschein.)
Miracle and Infidelity. By Samuel Knaggs. (Elliot Stock. 1s. 6d. net.)
Christ and the Eastern Soul. Lectures delivered by the late Charles C. Hall. (Unwin. 1s. 6d. net.)
Primitive Christianity. Vol. 2. By the late Otto Pfleiderer. (Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)
Luke the Physician. By Adolf Harnack. Vol. I. (Williams & Norgate. 6s.)
Man and the Bible. By J. Allanson Picton. (Williams & Norgate. 6s. net.)
Man's Origin, Destiny, and Duty. By Hugh MacColl. (Williams & Norgate. 4s. 6d. net.)
The Origin and Development of the Individual Soul. By net.)
the Rev. J. O. Bevan. (Williams & Norgate. 2s. 6d.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Five Months in the Himalaya. By A. L. Mumm. (Arnold. 21s. net.)
Essex. Painted by Burleigh Bruhl, R.B.A. Described by A. R. Hope-Moncrieff. (Black. 20s. net.)
Hampshire. Painted by Wilfrid Ball, R.E. Described by Rev. Telford Varley. (Black. 20s. net.)
St. Petersburg. Painted by F. de Haenen. Described by S. Dobson. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
Lausanne. Painted by J. Hardwicke Lewis and May Hardwicke Lewis. Described by Francis H. Gribble. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
Worcestershire. Painted by Thomas Tyndale. Described by A. G. Bradley. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Heart of Scotland. By A. R. Hope-Moncrieff. Illustrations in colour by Sutton Palmer. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
London in the Nineteenth Century. By Sir Walter Besant. (Black. 30s. net.)
The Short Cut to India. The Record of a Journey along the Route of the Baghdad Railway. By David Fraser. (Blackwood. 12s. 6d. net.)
The Englishwoman in India. By Maud Diver. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)
Side Tracks and Bridle Paths. By Lionel James. (Blackwood. 6s.)
Quaint Subjects of the King. By John Foster Fraser. (Cassell. 6s.)
Every-day Japan. By Arthur Lloyd. With Introduction by Count Tadasu Hayashi. (Cassell. 12s. net.)
The Face of China. By E. G. Kemp. (Chatto & Windus. 42s. net.)
The Colour of Rome. By O. M. Potter. Illustrations by Yoshio Markino. (Chatto & Windus. 42s. net.)
Servia by the Servians. Compiled and Edited by Alfred Stead. (Heinemann. About 16s.)
Conquering the Arctic Ice. By Ejnar Mikkelsen. (Heinemann. 20s. net.)
Days in Hellas. By Mabel Moore. (Heinemann. About 6s. net.)
We Two in West Africa. By Decima Moore and Major P. Gordon Guggisberg, C.M.G., R.E. (Heinemann. About 12s. 6d. net.)
Motor Tours in Yorkshire. By Mrs. Rodolph Stawell. With photographs by R. de S. Stawell. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s. net.)
Paris the Beautiful. By Lilian Whiting. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d.)
Florida Enchantments. By A. W. and Julian A. Dimock. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)
The Conquest of the Great North-West. By Agnes C. Lant. 2 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton. 21s. net.)
Romance of Empire Series. Edited by John Lang.
South Africa. By Ian D. Colvin. Illustrations by G. S. Smithard and J. R. Skelton. (Jack.)
The Turkish People. By Lucy M. J. Garnett. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
Rambles in Sussex. By F. G. Brabant. (Methuen. 6s. net.)
A Holiday in Connemara. By Stephen Gwynn, M.P. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
A Summer in Touraine: Being the Record of a Sojourn among the Châteaux of the Loire. By Frederic Lees. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
The Bretons at Home. By Frances M. Gostling. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
Among the Danes. By F. M. Butlin. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Pyrenees. By Hilaire Belloc, M.P. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
In Unknown Tuscany. By Edward Hutton. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
Walks in Paris. By George Cain. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
Monmouthshire. By G. W. Wade and J. H. Wade. (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net.)
Ionia and the East. By D. G. Hogarth. (Oxford University Press.)
The Commonwealth of Australia. By the Hon. Bernhard R. Wise. (Pitman. 7s. 6d. net.)
The Dominion of New Zealand. By Sir Arthur P. Douglas, Bart. (Pitman. 7s. 6d. net.)
Native Life in East Africa. By Dr. Karl Weule. Translated from the German by Alice Werner. (Pitman. 12s. 6d. net.)
Around Afghanistan. By Major De Bouillane De Lacoste. Translated from the French by J. G. Anderson. (Pitman. 10s. 6d. net.)
Switzerland of the Swiss. By Frank Webb. (Pitman. 6s. net.)
Things Korean. By the Hon. Horace N. Allan. (Revell. 3s. 6d. net.)
Twenty Years in Persia. By John G. Wishard. (Revell. 5s. net.)
The Supremacy of the Heart Life. By W. T. Moore. (Revell. 5s. net.)
Round the World in a Motor Car. By Antonio Scarfoglio. (Grant Richards. 16s. net.)
Portugal. By Ernest Oldmeadow. (Grant Richards. 10s. 6d. net.)
Among the Wild Tribes of the Afghan Frontier. By T. L. Pennell. With introduction by Field-Marshal Earl Roberts. (Seeley. 16s. net.)
A British Officer in the Balkans. By Major Percy E. Henderson. (Seeley. 16s. net.)
Behind the Veil in Persia and Turkish Arabia. By M. E. Hume-Griffith. (Seeley. 16s. net.)
The Miniature Portfolio Monographs: The Isle of Wight. By C. J. Cornish. (Seeley. 2s. net.)
Across Persia, from the Gulf to the Caspian. By F. B. Bradley-Birt, F.R.G.S. (Smith, Elder. 12s. 6d. net.)
Balkania. By W. Howard Flanders. (Elliot Stock.)
The Norfolk and Suffolk Coast. By W. A. Dutt. (Unwin. 6s.)
Through Uganda to Mount Elgon. By the Rev. J. B. Purvis. (Unwin. 6s.)
Paris in its Splendor. By E. A. Reynolds-Ball. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
Cairo: The City of the Caliphs. By E. A. Reynolds-Ball. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

FROM

THE DE LA MORE PRESS LIST.

Dutch Painting in the Nineteenth Century.

By G. HERMINE MARIUS.

Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS, with a photogravure and 130 reproductions in half tones.

Royal 8vo, panelled cloth gilt, 15s. net.

The Author of this work—herself an artist—is well known in Holland as a critic of great individuality. Her studies of Ruskin, the three brothers Maris, and her book on Rembrandt have been much appreciated for their sound judgment, a quality not always allied to such enthusiasm as she displays in dealing with her subject.

Old London.

A Series of Fifty Reproductions of Old Engravings Illustrative of the London of our Ancestors.

Compiled by WALTER L. McNAY.

Large 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

"In view of the revival of appreciation of London antiquities, ... Mr. McNay's volume of reproductions of the London of the Middle Ages is no small addition to the library on this subject already at our command. The harm of the book lies in the fact that here we have the atmosphere of old London, London as actually seen by the old engravers, not mere photographs of relics existing in our own day. . . . . The binding of the book is in sympathy with the subject, and the quality of the half-tone engravings is in keeping with the high standard of the De La More Press."—The Globe.

A FIRST GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

A SECOND GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

By Professor H. G. FIELDER and F. E. SANDBACH.

With Diagrams.

Square 8vo, 2s. 6d. net each. Sold Separately

These books are intended for science students who desire to read, with the expenditure of the minimum amount of time, scientific text-books in German. For this purpose, they will be found a valuable aid to a practical working knowledge of the German language. The grammatical portion is simple in arrangement and brief, while the reading examples and diagrams illu trating scientific instruments and experiments will help to fix the names in the memory.

HYPNOTISM: ITS HISTORY, PRACTICE, AND THEORY.

By J. MILNE BRAMWELL, M.B., C.M.

Demy 8vo, cloth, New Edition, 18s. net

A Complete Catalogue will be sent on Application.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD. (THE DE LA MORE PRESS)
32, George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

From A. C. FIFIELD'S New List.

By WILLIAM ENGLISH WALLING. RUSSIA'S MESSAGE. With 50 Illustrations, royal 8vo, 476 pages, Indexed, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net.

"The present volume is not, like so many recent books on Russia, a funeral march over a revolution that has been, but an overture and a prophecy concerning a revolution that is most surely to come. Mr. Walling can give good grounds for the hope that is in him. He has spent a considerable time in Russia, has mixed with the leaders of all parties, has accumulated a vast store of information, and possesses the deeper knowledge that springs from sympathy. . . . His book, indeed, is a book of faith in Russia's destiny. It may be something of a partisan statement, but it is well-informed, idealistic, and absorbing."

—Daily News.

By B. L. HUTCHINS. THE PUBLIC HEALTH AGITATION, 1833-48. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 156 pages, 2s. 6d. net.

"It sets out with admirable clearness the history of the public health agitation, and tells how Chadwick, Dr. Southwood Smith, and other pioneers created the crusade against disease, which is steadily bringing down the average mortality in this country."—Scotsman.

"Four capital lectures."—Manchester Guardian.

By C. D. SMITH. NATURAL MONOPOLIES, in Relation to Social Democracy. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 160 pages, 2s. 6d. net.

This book is a criticism, from the Socialist standpoint, of Mr. Mallock's theory of the relation between labour and ability in the production of wealth, and an attempt to establish an alternative theory. It deals with production and distribution, capital, earnings, ability and manual labour, minimum wages, interest, monopolies of power, position of originators, inducements to surrender monopolies, and a real democratic constitution.

By T. F. TAYLOR. THE FALLACY OF SPEED. Boards, fcap. 8vo, 1s. net. Postage 1½d.

"Mr. Taylor argues his point with great ingenuity and not a little cogency, and supports his unconventional argument by a surprising number of quotations from well-known people."—Scotsman.

By LADY CONSTANCE LYTTON. "NO VOTES FOR WOMEN." A Reply to Recent Anti-Suffrage Arguments. Post free 3½d. 32 pages. A temperate but able and forceful exposition of woman's case for suffrage.

By Mrs. M. A. MARKS. LANDHOLDING IN ENGLAND, in Relation to Poverty. 192 pages, crown 8vo, 1s. net, postage 2d.; cloth gilt, 2s. 3d.

THE CORN LAWS. A Popular History. 166 pages, crown 8vo, 1s. net, postage 2d.; cloth gilt, 2s. 3d.

"Mrs. Marks has given us two valuable books. She has written in a readable and human style two historical studies of a kind that ought to be in the hands of every British elector."—Daily News.

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, FLEET STREET, E.C.

NOW READY.

ROYAL LOVERS & MISTRESSES

The Romance of Crowned and Uncrowned Kings and Queens of Europe.

By Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT,
Author of "The Curse of the Romanoffs," etc. Illustrated.
Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s. net.

MAY WYNNE'S Successful Romance.

HENRY OF NAVARRE

The story of Mr. William Devereux's play, "Henry of Navarre," which is now being performed with unparalleled success at the New Theatre by Miss Julia Neilson and Miss Fred Terry.

HENRY OF NAVARRE

A Romance by MAY WYNNE.

Author of "A Maid of Brittany," etc. 6s.
Five Illustrations by H. M. BROCK.

Five Large Editions Sold. Sixth Edition Now Ready.

OTHER STORIES BY MAY WYNNE.

A MAID OF BRITTANY. 6s.
Cheaper Edition 1s. net cloth.
LET ERIN REMEMBER. 6s.
WHEN TERROR RULED. 3s. 6d.

READY SHORTLY.

A New Novel by the Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

THE OLD MAN IN THE CORN R
6s.
By BARONESS ORCZY.

HOUGHTON TOWNLEY'S Latest Novel
HOUGHTON TOWNLEY'S Latest Novel
"The Sin of the Duchess." 6s.

CAPT. HENRY CURTIES' Latest Novel
CAPT. HENRY CURTIES' Latest Novel
"Out of the Shadows." 6s.

CYRUS BRADY'S Latest Novel
CYRUS BRADY'S Latest Novel
"Little France." 6s.

GURNER GILLMAN'S Latest Novel
GURNER GILLMAN'S Latest Novel
"Only April." 6s.

OTHER FICTION STILL IN DEMAND.

BRANDED	Gerald Biss.
PATCOLA	Ena Fitzgerald.
A MAID OF HONOUR	Robt. Aitken.
THE UNLOVED	Ethel Hill.
MRS. PENROSE'S PHILOSOPHER	Harold Simpson.

All at 6s. each. At all Libraries.

NEW VOLUME IN THE LOTUS LIBRARY.

THE MATAPAN JEWELS.

By FORTUNE DU BOISGOBY.

Translated by G. F. MONKSHOOD.

Price 1s. 6d. net, cloth; 2s. net, leather.

Ask your bookseller for a Comple Series of the above, which includes works by such Masters of Prose as Anatole France, Daudet, Flaubert, De Maupassant, Bourget, De Musset, and other Great Writers.

GREENING & CO., LTD., 91, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

Messrs. BELL'S SPRING LIST

READY SHORTLY. Crown 4to.

Modern Homes. By C. RAFFLES DAVIDSON, Editor of "The British Architect." Illustrated by Photographs and Pen Drawings by the Author.

A book of typical specimens of modern country-house architecture, which should appeal to all who are interested in modern architecture, or who are contemplating building.

READY IMMEDIATELY. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

London's Lure. An Anthology of Prose and Verse Passages bearing on London. By HELEN and LEWIS MELVILLE. With special binding and end-papers.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

History of the Latin and Teutonic Nations (1494-1514). By LEOPOLD VON RANKE. A Revised Translation by G. R. DENNIS, B.A. (London). With an Introduction by EDWARD ARMSTRONG, M.A., Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford.

A thoroughly revised translation of this famous work, which Lorentz called one of Ranke's "most original and instructive contributions to history," and which gives a general account of the history of Europe during a period of the highest interest and importance.

JUST PUBLISHED. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

Canadian Types of the Old Regime (1608-1698). By C. W. COLBY, Professor of History in the McGill University, Montreal.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, 7s. 6d. net.

Builders of United Italy (1808-1898). By R. S. HOLLAND.

Lives of eight of the greatest figures in the struggle for Italian Independence. Eight Portraits are included.

JUST PUBLISHED. Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Life of Dean Colet, Founder of St. Paul's School. By the Rev. J. H. LUPTON, M.A., late Surmaster of St. Paul's School, and formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. With an Appendix of some of his English writings, and a facsimile portrait taken from the engraving in Holland's "Heroölogia." New and revised edition.

In view of the approaching celebration of the fourth centenary of St. Paul's School, special interest attaches to this new edition of Dr. Lupton's Life of its founder.

JUST PUBLISHED. Vol. IV., containing Parts VII. and VIII. Small 4to, with three Maps and two Plans, 12s. net.

The Itinerary of John Leland. Newly edited from the MSS. by LUCY TOULMIN SMITH.

Vol. V., completing the work, is in active preparation.

"The present edition was worth waiting for, and we are grateful to Miss Smith for the care she has bestowed on a congenial task. The result of Miss Smith's editing is eminently satisfactory. The 'Itinerary,' which is interspersed with extracts from charters and lives of the saints, abounds with lights on the vanishing feudal period, and there are few who will not find the indefatigable old antiquary an amusing and most instructive companion."
—Westminster Gazette.

Fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.

Catulli Carmina. Edited, with copious explanatory notes, by CHARLES STUTTAFORD.

"Intended for the class whose Latin has become rusty in consequence of the exigencies of a professional or business occupation. Well and wisely annotated for the purpose, and produced admirably."—Evening Standard.

JUST PUBLISHED. Demy 8vo, with 48 Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

In Viking Land: Norway, Its People, Its Fjords, and Its Fjelds. By W. S. MONROE.

A compendium of information on the history, people, religion, commerce, life, scenery, literature, music, and art of Norway, with suggestions for travellers and a short bibliography.

THE CHILDREN'S BOOK FOR EASTER.

NOW READY. Crown 4to, 2s. 6d. net.

Easter Eggs. An Easter Idyll for Children by CHRISTOPH VON SCHMID, with many illustrations in color and black and white by Miss M. V. WHEELHOUSE, and special binding and end-papers.

THE QUEEN'S TREASURES SERIES.

Small Crown 4to, 2s. 6d. net each.
NEW VOLUME JUST PUBLISHED.

Jan of the Windmill. By Mrs. EWING. With 8 colored plates and decorated title-page, covers, and end-papers, by M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

BELL'S MINIATURE SERIES OF GREAT WRITERS.

NEW VOLUME JUST PUBLISHED.
Pott 8vo, cloth, illustrated, 1s. net.

Goldsmith. By E. S. LANG BUCKLAND.

Write for Illustrated Prospectus, with full list of the Series.

NOW READY. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, 5s.

A Holiday Touch, and other Tales of Undaunted Americans. By CHARLES BATTELL LOOMIS, Author of "Cheerful Americans," &c.

"A light touch—the holiday touch, in fact—Mr. Loomis undoubtedly possesses. Gently satirical, mildly sentimental, or downright farcical . . . his stories are always cheerful and generally amusing, even when they have a touch of pathos. . . . Delightfully typical of American humour."
—Punch.

NOW READY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s.

Rugby Football. By HARRY VASSALL and ARTHUR BUDD. New Edition, thoroughly revised and brought up to date. By C. J. B. MARRIOTT, Secretary of the Rugby Union.

READY IMMEDIATELY. Crown 8vo, with four Coloured Plates and 24 other Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

Fish Stories. Alleged and Experienced, with a Little History, Natural and Unnatural. By CHARLES FREDERICK HOLDER and DAVID STARR JORDAN.

READY IMMEDIATELY. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Athletic Games in the Education of Women. By GERTRUDE DUDLEY, Director of the Women's Department of Physical Education, Chicago University, and FRANCIS A. KELLOR.

Demy 8vo, with numerous Illustrations, 8s. net.

When Railroads were New. The Story of Early Railway Enterprise in the United States. By CHARLES F. CARTER.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES

NEW VOLUMES.

NOW COMPLETED IN TWELVE VOLUMES. 5s. each.

The Prose Works of Jonathan Swift. Edited by TEMPLE SCOTT. In 12 vols., small post 8vo, with numerous Portraits and Facsimiles.

[Bohn's Standard Library

Vol. XII., completing the Edition. Complete Bibliography by W. SPENCER JACKSON, and Full Index, with Essays on the Portraits of Swift and Stella by the Right Hon. Sir FREDERICK FALKINER, K.C., and on the Relations between Swift and Stella by the Very Rev. J. H. BERNARD, D.D., Dean of St. Patrick's. With Two Portraits and a view of Woodpark.

"Messrs. Bell are to be warmly congratulated on the completion of their edition of Swift's Prose Works. Of the care and thoroughness of all concerned in it—editors, contributors, publishers, and printers—we cannot speak too highly. For the first time the student has a really complete and satisfactory edition of Swift's Prose Works, sufficiently annotated and provided with the needful bibliographical apparatus, issued in a very convenient form and at a very moderate price."—Athenæum.

A New Translation of Homer's Iliad.
In 2 Vols. Vol. I., containing Books I.-XII., in the Press.

THE ILIAD OF HOMER.

Translated into English Prose by E. H. BLAKENEY, M.A., Head Master of the King's School, Ely.

Also in Parts. Now Ready: Books I. and II., III. and IV., V. and VI., VII. and VIII., 1s. each. In the Press: Books IX. and X., XI. and XII., 1s. each.

READY IMMEDIATELY. 5s.

The Tragedies of Aeschylus. A new Prose Translation from a revised text. By WALTER HEADLAM, Litt.D., and C. E. S. HEADLAM, M.A.

IN THE PRESS. 5s.

More's Utopia. Robinson's Translation of the "Utopia," together with Roper's "Life of Sir Thomas More," and "More's Letters to Margaret Roper," and others. Edited with introduction and notes by GEORGE SAMPSON.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal Street, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1909.

BOUND BY HNM

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS-URBANA
3 0112 119969118